INTER-AMERICAN TREATY OF RECIPROCAL ASSISTANCE [1]

In the name of their Peoples, the Governments represented at the Inter-American Conference for the Maintenance of Continental Peace and Security, desirous of consolidating and strengthening their relations of friendship and good neighborliness, and

Considering:

That Resolution VIII of the Inter-American Conference on Problems of War and Peace, which met in Mexico City, recommended the conclusion of a treaty to prevent and repeal threats and acts of aggression against any of the countries of America;

That the High Contracting Parties reiterate their will to remain united in an inter-American system consistent with the purposes and principles of the United Nations, and reaffirm the existence of the agreement which they have concluded concerning those matters relating to the maintenance of international peace and security which are appropriate for regional action;

That the High Contracting Parties reaffirm their adherence to the principles of inter-American solidarity and cooperation, and especially to those set forth in the preamble and declarations of the Act of Chapultepec, all of which should be understood to be accepted as standards of their mutual relations and as the juridical basis of the Inter-American System;

That the American States propose, in order to improve the procedures for the pacific settlement of their controversies, to conclude the treaty concerning the "Inter-American Peace System" envisaged in Resolutions IX and XXXIX of the Inter-American Conference on Problems of War and Peace.

That the obligation of mutual assistance and common defense of the American Republics is essentially related to their democratic ideals and to their will to cooperate permanently in the fulfillment of the principles and purposes of a policy of peace;

That the American regional community affirms as a manifest truth that juridical organization is a necessary prerequisite of security and peace, and that peace is founded on justice and moral order and, consequently, on the international recognition and protection of human rights and freedoms, on the indispensable well-being of the people, and on the effectiveness of democracy for the international realization of justice and security,

Article 3:

1. The High Contracting Parties agree that an armed attack by any State against an American State shall be considered as an attack against all the American States and consequently, each one of the said Contracting Parties undertakes to assist in meeting the attack in the exercise of the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense recognized by Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations.

2. On the request of the State or States directly attacked and until the decision of the Organ of Consultation of the Inter-American System, each one of the Contracting Parties may determine the immediate measures which it may individually take in fulfillment of the obligation contained in the preceding paragraph and in accordance with the principle of continental solidarity. The Organ of Consultation shall meet without delay for the purpose of examining those measures and agreeing upon the measures of a collective character that should be taken.

Mexico: "Only because the Delegation of Guatemala has seen fit to make the preceding declaration, the Delegation of Mexico finds it necessary to reiterate that, in case there should occur a change in the status of Belice, there cannot fail to be taken into account the rights of Mexico to a part of the said territory, in accordance with historical and juridical precedents."

Resolved to persevere in the noble undertaking that humanity has conferred upon the United Nations, whose principles and purposes they solemnly reaffirm;

Within the United Nations, the Organization of American States is a regional agency.

Article 2: All American States that ratify the present Charter are Members of the Organization.

Article 3: Any new political entity that arises from the union of several Member States and that, as such, ratifies the present Charter, shall become a Member of the Organization. The entry of the new political entity into the Organization shall result in the loss of membership of each one of the States which constitute it.

Article 4: The Organization of American States, in order to put into practice the principles on which it is founded and to fulfill its regional obligations under the Charter of the United Nations, proclaims the following essential purposes:

(a) To strengthen the peace and security of the continent;

(c) Good faith shall govern the relations between States;

(d) The solidarity of the American States and the high aims which are sought through it require the political organization of those States on the basis of the effective exercise of representative democracy;

(e) The American States condemn war of aggression: victory does not give rights;

(f) An act of aggression against one American State is an act of aggression against all the other American States;

(g) Controversies of an international character arising between two or more American States shall be settled by peaceful procedures;

(h) Social justice and social security are bases of lasting peace;

(i) Economic cooperation is essential to the common welfare and prosperity of the peoples of the continent;

Chapter III

Fundamental rights and duties of States

Article 6: States are juridically equal, enjoy equal rights and equal capacity to exercise these rights, and have equal duties. The rights of each State depend not upon its power to ensure the exercise thereof, but upon the mere fact of its existence as a person under international law.

Article 7: Every American State has the duty to respect the rights enjoyed by every other State in accordance with international law.

Article 8: The fundamental rights of States may not be impaired in any manner whatsoever.

Article 9: The political existence of the State is independent of recognition by other States. Even before being recognized, the State has the right to defend its integrity and independence, to provide for its preservation and prosperity, and consequently to organize itself as it sees fit, to legislate concerning its interests, to administer its services, and to determine the jurisdiction and competence of its courts. The exercise of these rights is limited only by the exercise of the rights of other States in accordance with international law.

Article 10: Recognition implies that the State granting it accepts the personality of the new State, with all the rights and duties that international law prescribes for the two States.

Article 11: The right of each State to protect itself and to live its own life does not authorize it to commit unjust acts against another State.

Article 12: The jurisdiction of States within the limits of their national territory is exercised equally over all the inhabitants, whether nationals or aliens.

Article 13: Each State has the right to develop its cultural, political, and economic life freely and naturally. In this free development, the State shall respect the rights of the individual and the principles of universal morality.

Article 14: Respect for and the faithful observance of treaties constitute standards for the development of peaceful relations among States. International treaties and agreements should be public.

Article 15: No State or group of States has the right to intervene, directly or indirectly, for any reason whatever, in the internal or external affairs of any other State. The foregoing principle prohibits not only armed force but also any other form of interference or attempted threat against the personality of the State or against its political, economic and cultural elements.

Article 16: No State may use or encourage the use of coercive measures of an economic or political character in order to force the sovereign will of another State and obtain from it advantages of any kind.

Article 17: The territory of a State is inviolable; it may not be the object, even temporarily, of military occupation or of other measures of force taken by another State, directly or indirectly, on any grounds whatever. No territorial acquisitions or special advantages obtained either by force or by other means of coercion shall be recognized.

Article 18: The American States bind themselves in their international relations not to have recourse to the use of force, except in the case of self-defense in accordance with existing treaties or in fulfillment thereof.

Article 19: Measures adopted for the maintenance of peace and security in accordance with existing treaties do not constitute a violation of the principles set forth in Articles 15 and 17.

Chapter IV

Pacific settlement of disputes

Article 20: All international disputes that may arise between American States shall be submitted to the peaceful procedures set forth in this Charter, before being referred to the Security Council of the United Nations.

Article 21: The following are peaceful procedures: direct negotiation, good offices, mediation, investigation and conciliation, judicial settlement, arbitration, and those which the parties to the dispute may especially agree upon at any time.

Article 22: In the event that a dispute arises between two or more American States which, in the opinion of one of them, cannot be settled through the usual diplomatic channels, the Parties shall agree on some other peaceful procedure that will enable them to reach a solution.

Article 23: A special treaty will establish adequate procedures for the pacific settlement of disputes and will determine the appropriate means for their application, so that no dispute between American States shall fail of definitive settlement within a reasonable period.

Chapter V

Collective security

Article 24: Every act of aggression by a State against the territorial integrity or the inviolability of the territory or against the sovereignty or political independence of an American State shall be considered an act of aggression against the other American States.

Article 25: If the inviolability or the integrity of the territory or the sovereignty or political independence of any American State should be affected by an armed attack or by an act of aggression that is not an armed attack, or by an extra-continental conflict, or by a conflict between two or more American States, or by any other fact or situation that might endanger the peace of America, the American States, in furtherance of the principles of continental solidarity or collective self-defense, shall apply the measures and procedures established in the special treaties on the subject.

Chapter VI

Economic standards

Article 26: The Member States agree to cooperate with one another, as far as their resources may permit and their laws may provide, in the broadest spirit of good neighborliness, in order to strengthen their economic structure, develop their agriculture and mining, promote their industry and increase their trade.

Article 27: If the economy of an American State is affected by serious conditions that cannot be satisfactorily remedied by its own unaided effort, such State may place its economic problems before the Inter-American Economic and Social Council to seek through consultation the most appropriate solution for such problems.

Chapter VII

Social standards

Article 28: The Member States agree to cooperate with one another to achieve just and decent living conditions for their entire populations.

Article 29: The Member States agree upon the desirability of developing their social legislation on the following bases:

RESERVATIONS MADE AT THE TIME OF RATIFYING

GUATEMALA

None of the stipulations of the present Charter of the Organization of American States may be considered as an impediment to Guatemala's assertion of its rights over the territory of Belize by such means as at any time it may deem advisable.[1]

PERU

With the reservation that the principles of inter-American solidarity and cooperation and essentially those set forth in the preamble and declarations of the Act of Chapultepec constitute standards for the mutual relations between the American States and juridical bases of the inter-American system.

UNITED STATES

That the Senate give its advice and consent to ratification of the Charter with the reservation that none of its provisions shall be considered as enlarging the powers of the Federal Government of the United States or limiting the powers of the several states of the Federal Union with respect to any matters recognized under the Constitution as being within the reserved powers of the several states.

[1] With respect to this reservation, the Pan American Union consulted the signatory governments, in accordance with the procedure established by paragraph 2 of Resolution XXIX of the Eighth International Conference of American States, to ascertain whether they found it acceptable or not. At the request of the Government of Guatemala, this consultation was accompanied by a formal declaration of that Government to the effect that its reservation did not imply any alteration in the Charter of the Organization of American States, and that Guatemala is ready to act at all times within the bounds of international agreements to which it is a party. In view of this declaration, the States that previously did not find the reservation acceptable expressed their acceptance.

STRENGTHENING DEMOCRATIC INSTITUTION: THE DECLARATION OF CARACAS, ADOPTED BY THE 10TH INTER-AMERICAN CONFERENCE, MARCH 28, 1954 [1]

The 10th Inter-American Conference—

Reaffirms the fundamental principles and aims of the Charter of the Organization of American States,[2] the American Declaration of the Rights and Duties of Man,[3] the Universal Declaration of Human Rights,[4] and the resolutions of the Organization that refer to those principles and aims;

Reiterates recognition of the inalienable right of each American state to choose freely its own institutions in the effective exercise of representative democracy, as a means of preserving its political sovereignty, achieving its economic independence, and living its own social and cultural life, without intervention on the part of any state or group of states, either directly or indirectly, in its domestic or external affairs, and, particularly, without the intrusion of any form of totalitarianism;

Renews the conviction of the American states that one of the most effective means of strengthening their democratic institutions is to increase respect for the individual and social rights of man, without any discrimination, and to maintain and promote an effective policy of economic well-being and social justice to raise the standard of living of their peoples;

Resolves to unite the efforts of all the American states to apply, develop, and perfect the above-mentioned principles, so that they will form the basis of firm and solidary action designed to attain, within a short time, the effective realization of the representative democratic system, the rule of social justice and security, and the economic and cultural cooperation essential to the mutual well-being and prosperity of the peoples of the continent; and

Declares that this resolution shall be known as the "Declaration of Caracas."

DECLARATION OF SOLIDARITY FOR THE PRESERVATION OF THE POLITICAL INTEGRITY OF THE AMERICAN STATES AGAINST INTERNATIONAL COMMUNIST INTERVENTION, ADOPTED BY THE 10TH INTER-AMERICAN CONFERENCE, MARCH 28, 1954

Whereas the American Republics at the Ninth International Conference of American States declared that international communism, by its antidemocratic nature and its interventionist tendency, is incompatible with the concept of American freedom, and resolved to adopt within their respective territories the measures necessary to eradicate and prevent subversive activities;

The fourth meeting of consultation of ministers of foreign affairs recognized that, in addition to adequate internal measures in each state, a high degree of international cooperation is required to eradicate the danger which the subversive activities of international communism pose for the American states; and

The aggressive character of the international Communist movement continues to constitute, in the context of world affairs, a special and immediate threat to the national institutions and the peace and security of the American states, and to the right of each state to develop its cultural, political, and economic life freely and naturally without intervention in its internal or external affairs by other states.

The 10th Inter-American Conference—

Condemns the activities of the international Communist movement as constituting intervention in American affairs;

Expresses the determination of the American states to take the necessary measures to protect their political independence against the intervention of international communism, acting in the interests of an alien despotism;

Reiterates the faith of the peoples of America in the effective exercise of representative democracy as the best means to promote their social and political progress; and

Declares that the domination or control of the political institutions of any American state by the international Communist movement, extending to this hemisphere the political system of an extracontinental power, would constitute a threat to the sovereignty and political independence of the American states, endangering the peace of America, and would call for a meeting of consultation to consider the adoption of appropriate action in accordance with existing treaties.

Recommends that without prejudice to such other measures as they may consider desirable, special attention be given by each of the American governments to the following steps for the purpose of counteracting the subversive activities of the international Communist movement within their respective jurisdictions:

1. Measures to require disclosure of the identity, activities, and sources of funds, of those who are spreading propaganda of the international Communist movement or who travel in the interests of that movement, and of those who act as its agents or in its behalf; and

2. The exchange of information among governments to assist in fulfilling the purpose of the resolutions adopted by the Inter-American Conferences and meetings of ministers of foreign affairs regarding international communism.

This declaration of foreign policy made by the American Republics in relation to dangers originating outside this hemisphere is designed to protect and not to impair the inalienable right of each American state freely to choose its own form of government and economic system and to live its own social and cultural life.

EXHIBIT 6

DECLARATION OF SANTIAGO DE CHILE

(Provisional translation)

The fifth meeting of consultation of ministers of foreign affairs, expressing the general aspiration of the American peoples to live in peace under the protection of democratic institutions, free from all intervention and all totalitarian influence; and considering—

That the faith of the peoples of America in the effective exercise of representative democracy is the best vehicle for the promotion of their social and political progress (Resolution XCV of the 10th Inter-American Conference), while well-planned and intensive development of the economies of the American countries and improvement in the standard of living of their peoples represent the best and firmest foundation on which the practical exercise of democracy and the stabilization of their institutions can be established (Resolutions of the Special Committee To Study the Formulation of New Measures for Economic Cooperation);

That in Resolution XXXII, the Ninth International Conference of American States, for the purpose of safeguarding peace and maintaining mutual respect among States, among other things, resolved to reaffirm their decision to maintain and further an effective social and economic policy for the purpose of raising the standard of living of their peoples, and their conviction that only under a system founded upon a guarantee of the essential freedoms and rights of the individual is it possible to attain this goal; and to condemn the methods of every system tending to suppress political and civil rights and liberties, and in particular the action of international communism or any other totalitarian doctrine;

In Resolution XCV, the 10th Inter-American Conference resolved to unite the efforts of all the American States to apply, develop, and perfect the principles of the inter-American system, so that they would form the basis of firm and solidary action designed to obtain, in a short time, the effective realization of the representative democratic system, the rule of social justice and security, and the economic and cultural cooperation essential to the mutual well-being and prosperity of all the peoples of the hemisphere;

That harmony among the American Republics can be effective only insofar as human rights and fundamental freedoms and the exercise of representative democracy are a reality within every one of them, since experience has demonstrated that failure to adhere to such principles is a source of widespread disturbance and gives rise to emigration that causes frequent and grave political tensions between the state the emigrés leave and the states that receive them;

That the existence of anti-democratic regimes constitutes a violation of the principles on which the Organization of American States is founded, and endangers the living together in peaceful solidarity in the hemisphere; and

It is advisable to enounce, in a general way, a few principles and attributes of the democratic system in this hemisphere, so as to permit national and international public opinion to guage the degree to which political regimes and governments conform to that system, thus helping eradicate forms of dictatorships, despotism, or tyranny, without weakening respect for the right of the peoples freely to choose their own form of government,

Declares:

1. The principle of the rule of law should be assured by the separation of powers, and by the control of the legality of governmental acts by competent organs of the state.

2. The governments of the American Republics should be derived from free elections.

3. Perpetuation in power, or the exercise of power without a fixed term and with the manifest intent of perpetuation, is incompatible with the effective exercise of democracy.

4. The governments of the American States should ensure a system of freedom for the individual and social justice based on respect for fundamental human rights.

5. The human rights incorporated into the legislation of the various American States should be protected by effective judicial procedures.

6. The systematic use of political proscription is contrary to American democratic order.

7. Freedom of the press, of radio and television, and, in general, freedom of information and expression, are essential conditions for the existence of a democratic regime.

8. The American States, in order to strengthen democratic institutions, should cooperate among themselves within the limits of their resources and the framework of their laws so as to strengthen and develop their economic structure, and achieve just and humane living conditions for their peoples; and

Resolves: This declaration shall be known as "The Declaration of Santiago de Chile."

MOST CUBANS BACK CASTRO, BUT DISCONTENT IS RISING—DISSIDENTS FEEL PREMIER'S AUTHORITARIAN ACTS BETRAY REVOLUTION'S IDEALS—PREMIER SCORNS "COMPROMISES"

(By Tad Szulc)

New hatreds and mounting discontent are casting a shadow over Cuba's social revolution.

Millions of Cubans are still ready to shout their enthusiasm for the revolution and for what it has brought them, or promised to bring them, but increasing numbers are turning away from the regime of Premier Fidel Castro.

Many of these disenchanted Cubans are convinced that, through his authoritarian and arbitrary policies and his intimacy with communism, the Premier has betrayed the original ideals of the revolution.

However, Dr. Castro is depending on the revolutionary fervor of his supporters—and they are still a majority in Cuba—to overcome his growing political and economic problems.

"The revolution cannot tolerate compromises if it is to succeed," he says.

Despite an expanding secret police system, 19 months after the overthrow of the hated regime of Gen. Fulgencio Batista, a pattern of conspiracies, bombings, assassination attempts, and nocturnal gun battles is returning to the island.

Although most Cubans have no quarrel with the fundamentals of the revolution, more and more are shocked by the profoundly negative aspects of Dr. Castro's rule.

The Cuban revolutionary state has assumed the form of a virtual dictatorship, greatly infiltrated by communism and backed by the secret police, a volunteer corps of informers, armed civilian militias, and a disregard for judiciary procedures and individual liberties.

The right of habeas corpus has been suspended. The jails overflow with political prisoners, often held without trial. The freedom of the press has vanished with the disappearance of editorially independent newspapers.

The Labor Census has frozen workers in their jobs. The mass rallies and the techniques or chanted slogans and rhythmical clapping have thrown a mantle of awsome uniformity upon the crowds turning out to idolize Dr. Castro.

On weekends and evenings, tens of thousands of Cubans lose their identities under the blue-and-khaki militia uniforms. Children are dressed in uniforms and made to march, drill and shout slogans.

One recent evening in Havana, a wartime refugee from Europe stood watching a column of teenagers marching to the cadence of the chant of "Fidel, Fidel, Fidel." He shuddered and said, "My God, haven't we seen this before?"

The Cubans who dare to question any of the results of policies of the regime—the Communist inroads, the alliances binding Cuba to the Soviet bloc, the "hate America" campaign, the injuries dealt to the economy, the denial of constitutional freedoms—may find himself in deep trouble.

He may be arrested by the army intelligence service—which acts as the secret police—kept in jail indefinitely, dismissed from his government job, called a traitor, and exposed to hostility and ostracism.

ELECTIONS RULED OUT

Premier Castro has ruled out elections and representative democracy by describing talk of elections as "counterrevolutionary" and proclaiming, instead, what he calls "direct democracy."

When he first came to power, Dr. Castro vaguely spoke of elections within 18 months, or 2 or 5 years. But in his May Day speech this year, he made it amply clear that he thought representative democracy was a decadent system and that he preferred to derive his mandate from the approving shouts of his followers.

The crowd responded with the chant: "We've already elected Fidel."

The newspapers that spoke out independently on the situation in Cuba no longer exist. The daily and weekly press is a solid monotone of praise for the regime and the revolution, as are all the radio and television outlets.

Fear has become the principal instrument of power—the fear that one can be overheard, denounced and punished morally or materially. To denounce counterrevolutionary talk has become a patriotic virtue.

The Cuban revolution functions on two seemingly unrelated planes: That of the social reform and its positive achievements, and that of hate and repression.

If a relation between them exists in the minds of the men who run Cuba—which would raise the question of the price paid by Cubans for their social revolution—it does not seem to seep down to the men and women who are so fanatically committed to these opposing views of the revolution.

During a stay of 4 months in Cuba, after an absence of 5 months, this correspondent found profound changes in the attitudes of Cubans.

From conversations with hundreds of persons of many walks of life and shades of ideas, allegiances and opinions, the overwhelming impression was of a hardening of attitudes by persons on both sides of the revolutionary fence. The returning visitor was struck by the extent to which many pro-Castro Cubans had changed sides and acquired a new bitterness in the process, and by the fear pervading the nation.

Almost every conversation revealed the depth of feeling for or against the regime.

An agrarian reform official in Camaguey Province saw only the raising of living standards of the peasants in the new cooperatives, the doubling of the yield per hectare (2.47 acres) of rice and the sinister conspiracy against the revolution by "American imperialism."

"Our people love Fidel for what he has done for them," he said, pointing proudly to the new concrete homes of the cooperative's members. "And they would rather die than let the imperialists take it away from them."

CALLS NEWSPAPERS FREE

A taxi driver in Havana could not understand why his foreign passengers thought tional behavior of these people."

"The newspapers attack the United States because they are free to write what they think," he said, "and they are for Fidel because he is the greatest man Cuba has ever had. In the old days, the papers would be bribed to write lies."

A Government official reluctant to talk to a U.S. newsman, finally remarked: "I hope that you'll go home to write the truth about Cuba instead of all those lies about communism."

But a young doctor who had fought with Dr. Castro in the revolt against General Batista asked:

"Don't you have the courage to write the truth, that Fidel is a Communist and that Cuba is a Communist dictatorship?"

An economist who worked day and night for many months in planning economic reforms for Cuba during the early phase of the Castro regime said he thought the economy was being rapidly destroyed by the crash program to impose state controls.

WEALTH IS BEING RUINED

"Our wealth is being ruined and eroded," he said. "All the cooperatives and Soviet factories will never make up for the irrational behavior of these people."

An embittered businessman who lost an enterprise built in a lifetime of work put it this way:

"The Cuban people are being fooled and cheated by all the promises of social reform. In the end they will suffer more than they ever did before."

But as the controversy rages and the nation becomes increasingly divided, the social revolution is completing the initial phase of destroying the old order, which was comparatively easy, and is entering into the immensely difficult period of building a new Cuba.

The estates have been broken up and in their place the regime has installed peasant cooperatives. The moneyed class has been eliminated as a social force. The state has taken over most of the economic functions once exercised by free enterprise. The patterns of foreign trade have been redirected from the West to the East.

The preliminary steps of bringing social justice have been taken—about 15,000 low-cost dwelling units have been built, about 10,000 classrooms have been added to the school system, medical assistance has been made available, general living standards have shot up in some of the 2,200 cooperatives, and new beaches have been opened to the citizens. But the real task still lies ahead.

"The Revolution Needs Time," a poster at a cooperative in Las Villas Province proclaims, and Dr. Castro is the first to warn that great sacrifices will be necessary.

The Government is virtually without funds, and while the aid from Communist nations may help to lay the foundations for a future industrial prosperity, the immediate problem is for the state to make ends meet while operating an agricultural economy it has vastly disorganized.

If Cuba were a peaceful land today, Dr. Castro might be certain of realizing his goals and fulfilling the positive aspects of his revolution.

But his other policies have aroused such resentment and hatreds among those who think the true revolution has been betrayed and subordinated to Communist influences and the tactics of dictatorship that he is building on a volcano.

Few of those who oppose the Castro regime disagree with the objectives of the social revolution and the entire nation recognizes that the clock cannot be set back on land reform and many other revolutionary measures.

The rallying cry of the opposition is that the revolution must be saved and purified, and organizations dedicated to this aim have been formed.

EX-CASTRO MEN JOIN

The largest of these groups, the Movement of Revolutionary Recovery, is made up almost entrely of Dr. Castro's former companions: military officers, one-time underground plotters and propagandists.

The movement is part of a five-group democratic revolutionary front, which operates in Miami, but it is the only substantial action group organized both in Cuba and abroad.

Despite early organizational difficulties, the movement is establishing an underground in Cuba. This has a 10-man national directorate, provincial and municipal directorates and operates through secret 5-man cells.

Neither the movement of revolutionary recovery nor any of the other opposition groups constitute an immediate danger to the Castro regime, but as the division in the nation develops and the hatreds deepen, a major clash appears virtually inevitable.

To counter this danger and the invasions he fears may come, Dr. Castro is turning Cuba into a military camp. The army, about 25,000 men organized in three tactical commands, is supported by between 150,000 and 200,000 people's militias, which are assuming an increasingly important role in policing the country.

The militias are not a cohesive military force but they can be important in controlling small uprisings and aiding the army in larger operations. The militia members, including women, are trained with rifles and submachineguns, taught guerrilla operations and the manufacture and handling of homemade incendiary bombs.

REVOLUTION IS OVERWHELMING

The revolution is such an overwhelming fact of Cuban life that nothing else seems to matter. Virtually nothing else is discussed. Almost nobody can remain neutral or detached about it. In the words of its leaders: "You have to be for it all the way or against it all the way."

Cubans, therefore, must take sides—and they do it with a grim fanaticism that leads to hatreds that this nation has never known before, even in the days of its worst dictators, such as Gerardo Machado, who ruled from 1925 to 1933, or General Batista.

In this national division, families, marriages and friendships have been split. There are revolutionary sons and counterrevolutionary fathers—in deed and spirit. There are Fidelista wives and anti-Fidelista husbands. There are lifelong friends who no longer speak to each other because the revolution has come between them. There is fear, suspicion, and distrust, and in what these are doing to Cubans—a nation of charming and good-natured people—lies one of the great tragedies of the revolution.

These are the ingredients that could propel Cuba into civil warfare. It is impossible to predict whether the Castro regime could survive a major counterrevolution or a civil war. But as tensions mount in Cuba there is an all-pervading feeling that something must happen.

A high Communist official acknowledged in a recent conversation that if the regime had deep difficulties in overcoming its economic problems, "then, the question of the opposition will become extremely serious here."

Other observers feel that such a situation is unavoidable. They believe that the opposition to the Castro regime is growing perceptibly on grounds varying from communism to economic matters.

It is impossible to measure precisely the extent of active support that Dr. Castro and his revolution still enjoy, and thereby to draw a picture of the relative strength of the two camps.

A survey published in June by Bohemia magazine (before its owner fled into asylum at a foreign embassy, bitterly denouncing what he called the Castro treason) showed more than 85 percent of the population of 6,300,000 squarely behind the regime. But not even Dr. Castro's closest friends seriously believe this count.

A recent sample poll of the Institute for International Social Research, a U.S. private institution, found last spring that 43 percent of the Cubans were ardent supporters of the revolution, 43 percent were moderate supporters, 10 percent were against it, and the rest had no opinion.

But in the perceptible shift of opinions and allegiances, in which Dr. Castro apparently loses but never gains backers, most of the foreign observers in Havana agree that at present the Premier could probably count on the full approval of 60 percent of the nation.

Turning away from the revolution, and often becoming its most bitter enemies, are members of the middle class, which formed the backbone of the Castro rebellion when peasants and workers still cheered General Batista or remained aloof from the whole affair.

There is an erosion of support for the regime among many of its early leaders, ranging from Dr. José Miro Cardona, who was Premier briefly in the revolutionary government, to a rapidly growing list of diplomats, military officers and technicians. Many of them are now in jail or in exile.

The former top air force pilots are in prison. Scores of pilots of Cubana Airlines have flown their aircraft to exile abroad. Those who remain, are under surveillance by heavily armed guards during flights.

While these defections have obviously hurt the regime, they have also given it the opportunity to fill key posts with trusted, fanatical followers who, among other things, subscribe to the official thesis that anti-communism is counterrevolutionary.

SOME WORKERS DISILLUSIONED

Those who do not quit voluntarily, are quietly dismissed in what is a continuing process of purging and weeding out the remaining "moderates." The defectors automatically become "traitors" and are subjected to character assassination by Dr. Castro and his powerful propaganda machine. His usual comment is: "Good riddance. He did not have the stomach for a real revolution."

The regime is also beginning to lose support in the ranks of those workers and peasants who have not benefited from the revolution and are facing economic hardships. But the degree of this loss of faith is hard to measure. People are reluctant to discuss their politics.

The regime is, of course, aware of the deepening cracks in its popularity and its answer is a barrage of propaganda and indoctrination. Before a bout with pneumonia in July, Dr. Castro sometimes made as many as three weekly speeches. He even spoke twice while he was ill.

Radio and television stations, newspapers, movies, billboards and posters, rallies, indoctrination classes and everything else at the command of the Government are used to keep alive the revolutionary gospel. There are revolutionary radio jingles and Havana telephone operators recite revolutionary slogans while accepting calls.

All these play their assigned role in the revolution that has swept Cuba with utter finality and has made a return to the old order inconceivable—no matter what the future brings.

EARLIER REVOLUTIONS CITED

So deep has this impact been that the Cuban revolution would seem to rank with the century's three earlier fundamental revolutions.

The Cuban revolution found kinship with the Mexican, Soviet and Chinese revolutions, with the examples of Mexico and China influencing it the most—the first for reasons of racial and geographic identity, and the second because it was recent and faced similar problems in resolving the agrarian question and forcing industrialization.

The Cuban revolution hopes to be—and many students of revolutions think it will—the beginning of the great Latin-American social revolution that has been fermenting for the last two decades.

It has already deeply disturbed the entire hemisphere and, regardless of the immediate fate of the Castro regime, it is bound to leave a permanent mark.

RED INFLUENCE GROWING IN CUBA BEHIND FACADE OF THE REVOLUTION

(By Tad Szulc)

Behind the facade of the social revolution and Premier Fidel Castro's "humanism," Communist influence has become firmly rooted in the Cuban Government and in all the fields of national activity controlled by the regime.

Working openly on both the domestic and international levels since the early inhibitions about its public presence have been abandoned, communism has established in Cuba its principal base of operations in the Western Hemisphere.

Although it has been immensely successful in its infiltration tactics, communism may be the issue on which the fate of the Cuban revolution will ultimately hinge. Communist penetration into Cuban official life looms increasingly as the cornerstone on which the growing opposition to the Castro regime is being built.

The introduction of Communist influence through the Government's political alinement with the Soviet bloc, Moscow's military guarantees to Dr. Castro, the extensive trade pacts with Communist nations and the stationing here of large numbers of foreign Communist technicians, have solidified the animosity of the United States toward the revolutionary regime. These moves have also alarmed most other Latin American governments.

Communism has achieved its success in Cuba because it identified itself with the social revolution rather than expecting the revolution to become identified with it. The Social Popular Party, the Communist Party in Cuba, has made no effort to preach Communist doctrine among Cubans preferring to gain quiet acceptance and respectability while moving its members and sympathizers into important positions.

A top Communist official summed up this attitude in a recent conversation. "As the only political party functioning in Cuba, we think it would be rather obvious if we had a membership-recruiting drive now," he said.

The membership is believed to be less than 50,000, about three-quarters of 1 percent of the population. However, the party is working to build the ranks of its junior branch, which it calls the Socialist Youth.

POLITICAL VACUUM REMAINS

Since January 1, 1959, when Dr. Castro's forces deposed Gen. Fulgencio Batista, Cuban dictator, the Social Popular Party has been the only political party, in the classical sense of the word, to carry on official activities. The two traditional Cuban parties, Authentic and Orthodox, have virtually withdrawn from political life. The existence of the revolutionary regime has, in effect, created a political vacuum.

There had been talk that Dr. Castro would seek to make his 26th of July movement into a full-fledged political party, but after having ruled out elections he showed no special interest in this.

The 26th of July movement has become principally an indoctrination organ for the revolution and has been infiltrated to a large extent by Communists. Revolución, the regime's official newspaper, which calls itself the organ of the 26th of July movement, turned its plant over to the Communist daily Hoy early in July when it moved to new quarters.

The men who built the 26 of July movement with Dr. Castro in 1957 and 1958, have, for the most part, joined the opposition in Cuba or have gone into exile. Some of the more radical members now occupy Government positions, having left the movement to younger and more obscure radicals.

POLICY DEFENDS COMMUNISM

The degree to which communism has become identified with the Castro regime is best illustrated by the official policy that regards anticommunism as counterrevolutionary and divisive. No crime is more heinous in Cuba today than to be a counterrevolutionary.

This policy has brought about the dismissals and arrests of persons critical of communism and of its inroads into the regime. The list of those punished for anti-Communist sentiments is long.

It begins with former President Manual Urrutia Lleo, who was dismissed by Dr. Castro in July 1959. It continues with Maj. Huber Matos, who was tried in December for treason and was sentenced to 30 years in prison for having sought to resign his high army post in protest against Communist infiltration. It grows almost daily as officials, both high and low, are purged.

A voluntary resignation on the ground that communism is infiltrating the Government—usually followed by flight to asylum at a foreign embassy and exile—invariably brings a charge of treason. This has been true in the defections of a large number of Cuban ambassadors and others in recent months.

CASTRO ANSWERS CHARGES

In dealing with the mounting protest against communism, Dr. Castro and his companions have employed a method that can be said to confuse the issues.

"Are we Communists because we want to improve the lot of our suffering people?" Dr. Castro has asked in several recent television speeches.

"Are we Communists because we seek to create jobs, to end social injustice, to bring food to the hungry?" he has demanded. "Are we Communists because we are building schools and roads and houses, because we are fighting disease, because we do not want our peasants to die young?"

Dr. Castro has called his philosophy of social justice humanism, and an early slogan of the revolution, which was then immensely sensitive to charges of communism, was: "Our revolution is humanist and not Communist."

Of late, the regime has been leaning toward the method of figuratively shrugging its shoulders and saying, "Let them call us Communists, if they want to." To this officials usually add, as Dr. Castro has repeatedly done, that the United States always accuses any movement of social justice of being Communist so that it can destroy the movement.

This technique, backed by the chorus of official propaganda in the press, on radio and television, and by direct indoctrination of peasants, workers and soldiers, has been quite effective with most of the Cuban people, to whom communism is largely an abstraction.

In scores of conversations in provincial towns, villages, and agrarian cooperatives, this correspondent has found that many Cubans are perfectly willing to accept the argument that there is really nothing wrong with communism, which they consider a meaningless term, and that anticommunism is, indeed, a counterrevolutionary maneuver to destroy the regime of social justice.

On another level, among dedicated Castro supporters, or "Fidelistas," there is the refusal to recognize the existence of the Communist infiltration.

"You Americans always see communism in everything," a young architect at the housing institute replied aggressively to a question on how he felt about communism.

"If Fidel let the Communists move in, I would turn against him, too," he added.

There are virtually no channels in Cuba through which a different interpretation of the Communist question may be presented to the people.

INDEPENDENT PAPERS GONE

In May, Diario de la Marina and Prensa Libre, the last newspapers in Cuba with an independent editorial policy, disappeared as a result of direct or indirect Government pressure. The first was closed, and the second was taken over by a workers' committee to reappear as a proregime organ. Información, the only remaining paper that is not owned or controlled by the regime, takes no editorial stands, merely publishing Cuban and international news.

The owners of both Diario de la Marina and Prensa Libre were officially reported to have been facing economic troubles. They were said to have forced a showdown and then to have fled the country.

In reality, the workers' committees, coordinated by the regime-controlled National Collegium of Journalists and by printers' unions, refused to print anti-Castro editorials, ending an attempt to campaign against communism.

While most of its prelates are privately warning against Communist inroads, the Roman Catholic Church, as an institution, has not taken an openly anti-Communist stand. Since anticommunism is so firmly identified with counterrevolutionary activity in the minds of thousands of Cubans, the Catholic hierachy apparently has not been sufficiently sure of its ground to make a clear pronouncement.

Its concern is to avoid appearing to be opposed to social reform and to postpone as long as possible a final parting with Dr. Castro's regime.

The only major exception was Archbishop Enrique Pérez Serantes of Santiago de Cuba, who in May issued a pastoral letter warning that the Communist enemy was already "within the doors." However, he tempered his remarks by stressing his approval of the Government's social policy.

The six other bishops refused to follow his example, and what appeared at first to be the beginning of a major church-led debate on communism finally fizzled out. In Havana, Msgr. Eduardo Boza Masvidal, the young auxiliary bishop, has been periodically issuing general statements condemning denials of liberty and exaggerated state interference with national life. But he, too, has failed thus far to come to grips openly with the Communist issue.

When Archbishop Pérez Serantes' letter was read at a church in a sugar mill village in Camaguey, the only audible reaction was the subsequent protest of a few "Fidelista" women churchgoers.

In sum, the church has found it inconvenient or impossible until now to pose the Communist issue in the terms of a conflict of conscience for Catholics. Consequently, it is possible for the "Fidelistas" to go on supporting the regime while remaining good Catholics in their own eyes.

The anti-Communist sentiment, which is undoubtedly growing among the more articulate segments of the population, has no means of widespread expression or communication. But it is acting as a coagulating agent in the formation of numerically small but potentially important opposition groups frankly dedicated to the overthrow of the Castro regime.

Under the protective cover of the official denunciations of anticommunism, of the inability of the opposition to make its voice heard, and of the skillful confusion of issues, Communists have taken an important role in Cuban life.

The two men regarded as the foremost sympathizers of communism, if not as actual Communists, are Majors Raul Castro and Ernesto Guevara. They are Cuba's two most powerful officials after Premier Castro. And if many Cubans critical of the regime still refuse to believe that Dr. Castro is a Communist, the majority of them think that any fine distinction as to the degree of actual Communist affinities of the two majors constitutes hair splitting.

Major Castro, Minister of the Armed Forces, and Major Guevara, president of the national bank, who is in charge of the economy, have been in the forefront in the efforts to bring Cuba into partnership with the Soviet bloc.

The question of Premier Castro's ideological sympathies is one of the quandaries of revolutionary Cuba. While his early writings and pronouncements, including those issued during the fighting in the Sierra Maestra, showed that he had Socialist inclinations—not a rarity among Latin America's young people—few persons ever thought at the time that the future Premier would lean to Communist flirtations.

Recently, however, a well-known major, who served with Dr. Castro in the mountains and then held an important Government job, had new thoughts about the Premier.

"I would have never believed that Fidel was a Communist," he said, "but now I do."

In abetting the open Communist influence in the Government, Dr. Castro is giving it his personal endorsement in the eyes of most Cubans. Although many persons close to the revolutionary inner circle believe that Dr. Castro is being gradually surrounded by Communists and may be under their influence, he remains the unquestioned maximum leader and his views are accepted by his followers, who still number in the millions.

A similar endorsement, at least by indirection, is given to communism by President Osvaldo Dorticós Torrado, whose personal standing in the regime has grown considerably in the last 6 months. But there are Cubans who insist that Dr. Dorticós always had close ties with Communists.

TIES VIEWED AS STRONG

For a long time it was believed in Cuba that Dr. Castro could get rid of the Communists whenever he chose and that his alliance with them was simply a question of expediency. But his present deep entanglement with Communists in Cuba and abroad suggests that it would be impossible as well as inconvenient for him to sever his ties with communism.

It has been pointed out that, for example, President Gamal Abdel Nasser of the United Arab Republic maintains excellent trade and other relations with the Soviet Union, but does not tolerate domestic communism. However, the counterargument is made that the fabric of official life in the United Arab Republic has never been so deeply impregnated with communism as is the case in Cuba, where Dr. Castro has come to depend on Communists for the functioning of the governmental apparatus.

As for Raul Castro, he has just spent 3 weeks in Prague and Moscow in talks on subjects that were never made public. The belief in Cuba is that they dealt with arrangements for military assistance from Czechoslovakia and the Soviet Union.

Major Guevara has led the negotiations for the signing of trade pacts with the Soviet Union, Poland, Czechoslovakia, East Germany, and Communist China. As a part of these treaties, Cuba has been invaded by many—possibly hundreds—Communist technicians from these countries, supplementing the hard core of Communist specialists that Major Guevara has been bringing in quietly since last year from Latin-American and Western European capitals.

Capt. Antonio Nuñez Jiménez, executive director of the National Institute of Agrarian Reform, the organization controlling most of Cuba's economic life, returned in mid-July from a long visit to the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe. He delivered a 3-hour television report to the Cuban people in which he praised highly life in the Soviet Union.

PRO-REDS GET TOP POSTS

In recent months, both Major Castro and Major Guevara have been able to move into positions of power scores of men who are loyal to them and are regarded as strongly pro-Communist. Simultaneously, a purge of anti-Communist elements has been successfully under way in labor unions, professional associations, Havana University, the armed forces, most of the ministries and in all the other areas of national significance.

In the Foreign Ministry, effective control was assumed in June by Carlos Olivares, a "Raul man," who has long had public associations with Communists. He was named Under Secretary of Foreign Affairs, replacing Marcelo Fernades Font, who as National Coordinator of the 26th of July Movement during the 1959 revolution had opposed ties with the Communists.

Since his appointment, Señor Olivares has been carrying out a purge of anti-Communist ambassadors and diplomats, replacing them with men of known pro-Communist sympathies.

In the Cuban Confederation of Labor, the regime forced the ouster of David Salvador, a loyal "Fidelista," from the post of Secretary General after he had clashed with Labor Minister Augusto Martinez Sanchez over the purging of anti-Communists from the important Construction Workers Union. Señor Salvador had to yield to Jesus Soto, regarded as a Communist by most of those familiar with the confederation, who holds the job of Secretary of Organization.

At Havana University, the school's ruling body was thrown out by the Students Federation early in July, ending a dispute over student demands that "reactionary and counterrevolutionary" professors be discharged. Many professors had acquired "reactionary" reputations because they opposed communism.

ACADEMIC REFORM NEEDED

The university action, carried out with the advice of several professors who are openly members of the Communist Party, was presented as the prelude to an academic reform, which the school actually needed badly.

Early in July, the National Collegium of Lawyers, whose headquarters were occupied physically by a "revolutionary" group, expelled nearly 100 lawyers who had anti-Communist sentiments.

The president of the National Collegium of Journalists, who directed the seizures of Diario de la Marina and Prensa Libre, has made trips to Moscow and Prague to participate in meetings of the Communist-controlled International Federation of Journalists.

The head of the Television-Revolución channel over which Dr. Castro makes most of his appearances, directed in the 1940's the "1010" radio station, which was the voice of the Communist Party when it had ministers in General Batista's Cabinet.

Maj. Ramiro Valdéz, head of the army intelligence service which acts as Cuba's secret police, has never made a secret of his admiration for communism and the Soviet Union. In July, he traveled to Prague and Moscow with Major Castro.

Maj. William Galvez, the army's inspector general and Major Castro's top aide, visited Peiping and Moscow in May. In Communist China, he spoke of the identity of the Chinese and Cuban revolutions.

COMMUNISTS HAVE PRESTIGE

The Communist Party has great prestige in official circles. At a recent rally, its president, Juan Marinello, and Carlos Rafael Rodriguez, editor of the party newspaper Hoy, sat on the terrace of the Presidential Palace with the members of the Cabinet.

The party has a daily radio program, "The Hour of the Popular Socialist Party," over the station of the National Institute of Agrarian Reform. Señor Marinello was one of the speakers in the "Popular University" weekly television series, which began in May with an appearance by Dr. Castro.

The party was also an official cosponsor of the Latin American Youth Congress arranged by the Government.

With the forthcoming opening of the Soviet Embassy in Havana and the expected establishment of diplomatic relations with Communist China, the rhythm of Communist activities in Cuba is expected to quicken, both domestically and internationally.

Communist exchange professors are likely to come to Havana University. The already considerable flow of Soviet books to the public libraries will probably grow. In all, Communist influence in Cuba seems certain to go on rising in all the fields.

CUBANS FEELING ECONOMIC PINCH—SHIFT IN TRADE AND REGIME'S SPENDING DRAIN WEALTH

(By Tad Szulc)

An indefinite period of austerity appears to be facing the Cuban people as a result of domestic and international economic policies of the Government.

This will mean the lowering of living standards for urban middle class and workers' groups and a probable slowdown in the revolution's efforts to improve the lot of the destitute rural population.

Both developments probably will have important political repercussions in Cuba, strengthening the opposition and weakening the position of Premier Fidel Castro.

Difficulties have already begun to be felt across the nation, but economists believe their effects will become sharply noticeable toward the end of the year.

Cuba has lived "off the fat" of her basic wealth since the revolution began, they say, but at this juncture—19 months after Premier Castro came into power—the economic facts of life are beginning to catch up with the chaotic policies of an inexperienced and impatient government.

FUNDAMENTAL PROBLEM

The fundamental problem facing the Castro government is how to go on financing the social revolution, which is the primary reason for the regime's existence, while maintaining normal economic activity.

The hurried shift of the economy from private enterprise to state control eliminated important sources of revenue before new wealth could be created by the revolution. Also, Dr. Castro's dispute with the United States has deprived Cuba of high-price sugar sales.

The latest trade transactions with the Soviet Union and Communist China, as announced in Havana late in July, will not compensate Cuba for the loss of the U.S. market, while tying her economically to the Communist bloc.

The prospects, therefore, are for inflation-breeding deficit financing, accompanied by a general tightening of belts. Both of these are already occurring.

SITUATION WAS PREDICTED

This situation was widely predicted nearly a year ago as the regime stepped up its seizures of property.

Dr. Felipe Pazos, who served as president of the National Bank until his replacement by Maj. Ernesto Guevara last November, said at the time that, sooner or later, the Government would have the alternative of increasing taxation or increasing inflation, or accepting a dangerous blend of the two.

But to all appearances the Castro regime prefers the risks implicit in such solutions to any delay in implanting a state economy and in liberating itself from the traditional bonds with the United States.

An accurate judgment of the Cuban finances and economy is impossible because the Government has published no comprehensive budget figures this year and has been extremely guarded with financial statistics in general.

It is estimated, however, that the internal budget deficit in 1960 will run to at least $400 million. According to partial figures released by the Government, expenditures will run to no less than $800 million and only a very generous estimate makes it likely that $400 million will be collected by the treasury.

DEFICIT LAST YEAR

Last year, when tax collections were high from businesses and agriculture in private hands, when back taxes were paid at a high rate and when customs receipts from imports still stood at a relatively high level, the Government wound up with a $130 million deficit.

Bankers in Havana believe that at least $300 million in new money was printed in the first half of 1960, to cover Government expenses and to try to meet the insatiable needs of the National Institute of Agrarian Reform in its land, industrial, and other operations. All the new bills in circulation are signed by Major Guevara with his nickname, Ché.

The increase of money in circulation and acute shortages of most consumer goods have already started pushing up prices.

Major Guevara, who is the czar of the Cuban economy, evidently foresaw the dangers of inflation long ago. A drive has been under way to get the regime-controlled labor unions to adopt resolutions freezing their members' salaries and accepting the need for eventual pay cuts.

As one of its first measures, the Castro regime ordered the raising of salaries early in 1959. At that time, most of the economy was still in private hands. But now the regime has inherited these inflated payrolls. The remaining private businessmen also are having difficulties in meeting payrolls.

CUSHION FOR WORKERS

However, the 1959 pay raises, a 50-percent slash in rents and cuts in power rates provided a comfortable cushion for workers in the cities and kept them in relative prosperity.

A comment on the workings of the economy was provided by department store operators in Havana and Santiago de Cuba who reported a marked increase this year in purchases of items under $2 in price, but virtually no sales of the higher priced goods traditionally bought by wealthier groups.

Inflation can soon erase the gains, while the freezing of pay scales may widen the gap between wages and prices.

These trends are posing serious difficulties in the financing of the social revolution. The principal goals this year are the full organization of more than 2,200 land cooperatives and the financing of the 1961 sugar crop, the public works program, housing, schoolbuilding, industrialization and tourist facilities.

Virtually none of the cooperatives has shown a profit and the Agrarian Institute must provide loans to pay wages and expand operations. However, the 1,000 sugarcane cooperatives were organized just last month.

The essential purpose of the cooperatives was to end the traditional 9 months of annual unemployment in the canefields during the sugar "dead season" by diversifying production. This unemployment is considered to be the basis of most of Cuba's social ills.

COSTS EXCEED REVENUE

The first rice, tomato, peanut, and other crops are beginning to come up on some of the cooperatives, but revenue has not come close to the initial investment costs.

In hundreds of the cooperatives the regime is behind in wage payments or has paid, at least in part, in vouchers for purchases in "people's stores."

The July cut of the Cuban sugar quota by the United States has created another serious problem for the sugar cooperatives.

Under the law, the owners of the mills, 75 percent of which are still in private hands, had to pay cane producers 3.64 cents a pound for the delivered sugar. The cut in the U.S. quota makes it impossible for the operators to meet this price.

This will make it even harder to pay wages on the sugar cooperatives. The regime has threatened to confiscate the mills that fail to pay the prescribed price, but in taking them over it will only add to its fiscal burdens.

The cane problem illustrates the hardships resulting from Cuba's shift in sugar sales from the United States to the Communist bloc.

LOSES MONEY IN SWITCH

While Cuba would have received $92 million in cash for the 700,000 tons of sugar that were cut from her U.S. quota, the subsequent sale of these 700,000 tons to the Soviet Union and of 500,000 tons to Communist China will have a total value of only $78 million.

The Communist governments pay only Cuba's minimum world market price of 3.25 cents a pound. The United States had paid 2 cents more than the world price.

Moreover, both the Soviet Union and Communist China are paying Cuba only 20 percent in cash and the balance in commodities, machinery, and "complete factories." While Cuba undoubtedly needs these items in the long run, her immediate and urgent concern is cash.

In taking control of the economy, the Government has become the island's principal debtor. It has not paid its power bills in several months and owes millions to contractors and suppliers. Operating hundreds of money-losing enterprises, such as the big and empty Havana hotels, it gets deeper and deeper into debt.

Its debt position is just as striking in the international field. This explains, in large part, the phenomenon of the high dollar reserves of which the regime is so proud.

While there was about $60 million in exchange in the treasury when Dr. Castro took over, the present reserves stand at almost $200 million. But Cuba owes $100 million to U.S. exporters, $60 million to U.S. and British oil companies for the crude oil she imported before seizing their three refineries, an unspecified amount to Britain for her airline fleet of Viscounts and Britannias, and lesser amounts to West Germany and France.

LANDOWNERS UNPAID

No effort has been made to begin paying compensation for the $250 million worth of American-owned land seized under the Agrarian Reform Act. The 20-year bonds promised for the land have not even been printed.

The treasury reserves have grown because Cuba also drastically cut imports from the United States from nearly $700 million in 1957 to less than $300 million in 1960.

Under all these policies, including tight exchange controls, Cuba has been hoarding dollar exchange for unexplained purposes. The dollars are not being used to purchase consumer goods elsewhere. For instance, bartered sugar pays for the oil Cuba now buys from the Soviet Union.

It is known, however, that some of these precious dollars are being used to purchase weapons abroad for Dr. Castro's growing military establishment.

Although Major Guevara has maintained the official fiction of the peso's parity with the dollar, the Cuban currency is not quoted on foreign money markets, and in Havana's black market a dollar brings three pesos or more.

The regime's mounting financial troubles are already reflected in some of the basic revolutionary endeavors.

PUBLIC WORKS SLOWED

The public works program, mostly dedicated this year to the building of access roads for the Agrarian Reform Institute's cooperatives has slowed perceptibly because of the lack of funds.

The housing program, which was to add 10,000 new dwelling units in 1960, is grinding to a halt. The Housing and Savings Institute is not deriving enough income from the national lottery, which was intended as its main source of income, and supplementary funds from the Social Security Bank are being diverted to the Agrarian Institute.

However, 7,000 new school classrooms have been completed this year and Dr. Castro recently inaugurated a "school city" in the Sierra Maestra that eventually is to accommodate 20,000 children.

Uncounted millions have been spent on the building of public beaches and tourist facilities—a pet project of Dr. Castro—leading even some of the Premier's most devoted followers to wonder about his system of revolutionary priorities.

In its natural eagerness to cut down on unemployment, the Government plans to spend $92 million this year on new industry in addition to the credits from the Communist countries for the "complete factories" they are providing.

JOBS PROMISED TO 20,000

The industrialization program promises to absorb up to 20,000 workers this year from the pool of unemployed, which most of the year is as high as 700,000 persons, or more than 10 percent of the population.

With allowances for the annual natural increase in the labor force and the loss of employment in the private sector, it is doubted that new industry and new land cooperatives can make a serious dent in the unemployment problem for years. Major Guevara's contention that unemployment will be eliminated by 1962 is believed to be no more than wishful thinking.

While it is presumed that Cuba will have no trouble selling her 1960 sugar crop of 5,800,000 tons and even some of her reserve sugar, the picture for this basic commodity appears to be dark for the years to come.

The distortions in the world sugar market caused by Cuba's loss of the U.S. market and the forward surge of new producers may threaten Cuban sales next year, especially if the European beet sugar crop is good and if Cuba insists on maintaining a high price.

In 1962, Cuba may be hit by the precisely opposite effects of her sugar policies: not enough sugar to sell. Anticipating land seizures, farmers did very little planting and fertilizing last spring while the confusion attending the organization of the new cooperatives prevented an orderly preparation of the 1962 crop by the state. Pessimists among the sugar experts predict that the 1962 harvest may bring as little as 4,200,000 tons.

CATTLE INDUSTRY CHAOTIC

The once rich cattle industry poses another problem for the Government. The utterly chaotic seizure of herds by the Agrarian Institute has completely disorganized the industry, affecting pastures and breeding procedures.

In its urge to export meat and make it available cheap in the cities, the institute has been slaughtering breeding stock at a fast rate.

An embittered cattleman, watching a friend eat a steak at a Havana restaurant, told him: "You'd better enjoy it. You may be eating a $20,000 prize bull."

In sum, the economic problem of the revolutionary regime is one of tremendous overextension. Economists agree that it need not mean an economic collapse, but contend that many years will be required to rebuild an efficient economy in the hands of the state, a process necessitating great sacrifices and more efficient planning than the eager but inexperienced Havana regime has thus far been able to provide.

CUBA SHARPENING U.S. DISPUTE IN DRIVE FOR LATIN LEADERSHIP

(By Tad Szulc)

The Cuban Government, which is trying to spread the influence of its revolution throughout Latin America and to turn the Latin countries against the United States, does not seem interested in reaching an accommodation with Washington.

Despite the frequent protestations of the government of Premier Fidel Castro that it is a victim of U.S. imperialism and that it is eager to negotiate all differences on an equal footing, most diplomats in Havana believe that Cuba prefers to maintain, and even to sharpen, the present tension.

The violence and the bitterness of the anti-U.S. campaign carried on by Cuba at home and wherever possible in the rest of Latin America do not provide a climate in which any negotiations could be fruitful.

Months before the United States cut the Cuban sugar quota, this campaign adopted as its principal slogan the cry of "Cuba yes, Yankees no." This cry echoes throughout Cuba in the speeches of the regime's top officials, at the anti-U.S. rallies being held with increasing frequency, in official newspapers and on radio and television programs.

Insults have been heaped on President Eisenhower, Secretary of State Christian A. Herter and other U.S. officials, and the attacks seem to gain in intensity every day.

In a calculated act of defiance, the Castro regime has allied itself closely with the Communist bloc, thus bringing Soviet influence to within 90 miles of the United States.

This system of political and economic alliances was highlighted early in July by Premier Khrushchev's offer to send Soviet missiles against the United States should Cuba ever be attacked by the "Yankees."

Despite the Soviet involvement in the Caribbean, and despite all the hostile acts in the economic and political field, the United States appears powerless for the time being to solve the Castro problem.

PROBLEM TERMED INSOLUBLE

A Western European diplomat in Havana commented recently that "this little island has created one of the most insoluble foreign policy problems that the United States has had to face" since World War II.

In the meantime, the possibility that Premier Castro will be removed from leadership for an indefinite period during his recuperation from the pneumonia attack he suffered last month could deeply affect the entire Cuban picture, domestically and internationally.

Despite the steadily increasing influence of radical elements such as his brother Maj. Raul Castro and Maj. Ernesto Guevara, the Premier remains the greatest symbol of the revolution.

Because of their personal allegiance to the Premier, millions of Cubans stand steadfastly behind the revolution, even if some of its most recent aspects disturb them.

LOYALTIES COULD BE ALTERED

However, if Major Castro, who is Armed Forces Minister, succeeds his brother as Premier even temporarily, as is expected, the whole structure of revolutionary loyalties could be thrown out of balance.

This could be particularly true if the Premier was absent for a long time and if Major Castro and Major Guevara sought to take advantage of their power to implant still deeper their extreme leftwing policies.

Major Guevara, who directs the economy as president of the National Bank, would probably work closely with Major Castro if the latter became Acting Premier.

Notwithstanding great efforts in recent months to build sympathetic images of the two majors, their personal popularity is limited. They are resented even by some of Premier Castro's closest friends and collaborators, especially since they began moving their own followers into more and more of the regime's key positions.

OPPOSITION MIGHT GROW

A situation whereby Premier Castro would be forced to stand aside for a prolonged period would undoubtedly be exploited by foes of the Government, who have been working hard to organize an opposition movement. The recrudescence of such opposition activities could bring greater repression by the regime, serving to increase domestic tensions.

In the international field Cuba's position may harden at the Conference of American Foreign Ministers that will deal with the Cuba-United States dispute and with Soviet interference in Latin America, if Major Castro and Major Guevara are in control of the regime.

The key to the whole situation is the length of time that Premier Castro might be away from his post.

It is taken for granted that Premier Castro's brother will succeed him if he must be absent. The Premier made this clear some time ago. Major Guevara has not been mentioned in the line of succession, but today his power is so great he cannot be ignored in a reshuffle of the top leadership. An unknown quantity is President Osvaldo Dorticós Torrado, who in recent months has been playing an increasingly important role, seemingly favoring radical trends in the regime.

AFFECTS LATIN COUNTRIES

The Cuban situation is intimately tied to the situation in all Latin America. It affects each of the individual governments as well as the position of the United States in the Western Hemisphere.

In the 19 months of its existence, the Castro regime has worked hard to build up an image of the United States as the enemy of social justice, progress, and Latin America's emancipation from the imperialist yoke.

Because the natural sympathies of large segments of Latin-American populations are directed toward the concept of the Cuban social revolution and the personality of Premier Castro, this image has found sufficient acceptance to prevent most of the hemisphere' governments from siding openly with the United States in a dispute with Cuba.

Privately, these governments deplore the behavior of the Castro regime and are alarmed by the entry of the Soviet Union into the hemisphere and by the increasing Communist influence in Havana. Since most of them represent moderate, middle-of-the-road groups, which believe in evolution instead of revolution as a means of solving their countries' problems, they also fear the contagion of the revolutionary ideas emanating from Havana.

LATIN LEADERS CRITICIZED

In its drive for the political leadership of Latin America against the United States, the Castro regime has openly classified most of the hemisphere's rulers as its enemies and as the enemies of their people.

President Romulo Betancourt of Venezuela, President Alberto Lleras Camargo of Colombia, President Jorge Alessandri Rodriguez of Chile and Premier Pedro G. Beltrán of Peru are the favorite targets of the official Cuban propaganda.

Posters on Government buildings in Havana describe Cuba as the "Free Territory of the Americas," in a clear allusion to the often repeated statements by Dr. Castro and his top aides that the day of Latin America's "liberation" is approaching.

Last May, President Dorticós toured Latin America on an expedition specifically designed to gain support against the United States. Some of his statements about the United States were so completely removed from reality that the Department of State sent Cuba a special note of protest.

On July 26, the anniversary of Dr. Castro's revolutionary movement, an extreme leftwing Congress of Latin American Youth opened in Cuba. The congress' purpose was to discuss plans to oust all U.S. influence from Latin America.

On the same day, Dr. Castro urged in a fiery speech that the Andes become "the Sierra Maestra of the Americas." It was from the Sierra Maestra that the Castro rebels conducted their guerrilla warfare against the regime of Gen. Fulgencio Batista.

Earlier this year, Major Guevara published in his book, War of Guerrillas, a detailed blueprint for rebel operations that, he wrote, could be carried out "in our America."

NEGOTIATE WITH PERONISTS

At present, Cuban leaders are in secret negotiations with a group of leaders of Peronist forces in Argentina—followers of the ousted dictator Juan D. Perón—aiming at a pact for joint operations. President Arturo Frondizi of Argentina could become the first target of such operations.

While Dr. Castro apparently does not intend to go back on his Soviet alliances, his representatives hope to set at rest the concern of Latin American governments on this subject when the hemisphere Foreign Ministers convene August 16 in San José, Costa Rica.

Such is the sensitivity of Latin Americans on the Cuban question that Cuba was not directly mentioned in Peru's request for the Ministers' conference. The proposal spoke only of extracontinental activities in the area.

Cuban propaganda, distributed by the Government-operated Prensa Latina news service, by Cuban Embassies in Latin American capitals and by radio programs beamed at other Latin countries from powerful transmitters in Havana, concentrates on the denigration of the United States and urges the "liberation" of "our sister Republics."

Cuban propaganda materials have been seized repeatedly by authorities in other countries. Cuban agents have been arrested and Cuban diplomats expelled for engaging in subversive activities.

PUERTO RICAN REVOLT PUSHED

Cuba has been encouraging Puerto Rican nationalists to fight for independence from the United States by any available means. It has even gone to the extreme of dispatching propaganda materials to the Deep South of the United States to incite the Negro populations against the Federal Government.

The pattern of Cuban activities in Latin America has suggested to diplomats that the Castro regime finds it infinitely more attractive to keep up its feud with the United States than to try to settle it.

This trend has also suggested to a number of friendly diplomats that the United States should abandon temporarily all the efforts to force a direct solution of the "Castro problem" and concentrate instead on recouping its positions in the rest of Latin America.

They say that if the United States can convince Latin America of its sincere desire to help solve that area's basic social and economic problems, the Castro influence will proportionately decrease and the Cuban problem may eventually find its own solution.

UNITED STATES GRANTED LOAN TO PERU

A step was taken in that direction July 28 when the United States announced the grant to Peru of a $53,200,000 loan for land and farm equipment.

It was the first time that the United States had agreed to a major aid program with deep social implications. In the past, U.S. assistance concentrated on industrial and related projects, although there were some minor social undertakings, and on straight financial loans to aid sagging economies.

The loan to Peru followed a much smaller one to the same country earmarked for housing. That, too, was a departure from past policies. Much of the credit for achieving a change in the U.S. thinking on these matters is given to the patient eloquence of Premier Beltrán.

The Peruvian projects may represent the beginning of the new assistance program announced by President Eisenhower July 11, which may call for an initial outlay of $500 million.

While Latin Americans were pleased with this evidence of U.S. interest in their problems, many of them took some pleasure in recalling that the new socially oriented approach to hemisphere problems was proposed by Brazil's President, Dr. Juscelino Kubitschek, 2 years ago. Only the urgency of the Cuban crisis, they stressed, led the United States to begin taking the Kubitschek suggestions seriously, after first dismissing them as unfeasible in the immediate future.

NEW PRESIDENT AWAITED

Latin Americans are, however, resigned to the fact that any major new program must await the inauguration of a new administration in the United States.

Many of those who are friendly to the United States think that the new administration will have perhaps the last chance to repair the deteriorating Latin American relationships and set them on a new road.

Faithful to their traditional sympathy for Democrats in the United States, most Latin Americans are hoping for the election of Senator JOHN F. KENNEDY as President. A question often asked in Havana is: "Do you think that the relations between Cuba and the United States will improve if the Democrats win?"

Aside from Communist and leftwing groups of workers and students vociferously supporting Dr. Castro in Latin America, many Latin Americans refuse to share the U.S. preoccupation with communism in Cuba. They often agree that this is just another case of Washington's using the specter of communism to protect its economic interests.

While many Latin Americans recognized that Cuba was at fault in seizing and confiscating U.S. property without offering reasonable compensation, they also took a critical view of President Eisenhower's drastic cutting of the Cuban sugar quota.

ECONOMIC SANCTION SEEN

There would have been few objections if the United States had simply refused to go on paying its 2-cent premium above the world price on quota sugar, but the outright cut of the quota appeared to many Latin Americans as a naked attempt to force the overthrow of Premier Castro through economic sanctions.

While the Castro regime appears to be carrying out its anti-U.S. campaign for political gain, its motives also include real fears and grievances and even a historical concept.

Premier Castro is convinced that the United States will begin, or assist, an attack on Cuba, as he says was the case in Guatemala when President Jacobo Arbenz Guzman, a man of the extreme left, was in power there in 1954.

He has said repeatedly that Washington intends to turn Cuba into another Guatemala or into another Spain.

While this fear is genuine to a large extent, the alleged threat of aggression has also proved to be a first-rate instrument for keeping the revolutionary spirit alive. It is an excuse for proceeding with the "hate America" campaign, for building up military strength through militias, which have become a virtual people's army alongside the regular military establishment, and for attracting the sympathies of Latin American lands and other countries.

In fact, an aggression complex has developed in Cuba, and every act or word in the United States that is thought to be critical of the revolutionary regime is immediately presented in the official newspapers as a new aggression.

In support of this aggression theory, the Government continually reminds Cubans and foreigners that the top officials of the ousted regime of General Batista, classified in Cuba as war criminals, are harbored in the United States and are allowed to conspire freely.

FLIGHTS WERE HALTED

When occasional light planes escaped the vigilance of the U.S. authorities last year and early this year to make forays over Cuba, the regime's propaganda spoke of daily bombing raids. Although these flights are now being prevented, no credit has been given to the United States.

One of the principal grievances of the Castro regime is that few words of protest were heard from the United States while the Batista government committed atrocities against the opposition but there was an immediate outcry when more than 500 war criminals were executed early last year.

Behind the Cuban revolutionary attitude toward the United States is the belief, held firmly by Premier Castro and his companions, that the United States has entered into a period of decadence and that the future of the world is about to enter the hands of young revolutionaries everywhere.

In May, Revolución, the regime's semiofficial newspaper, published a special 40-page supplement dedicated to this theory of U.S. decadence. Another 80-page supplement in July dealt with racial problems in the United States.

And in a recent television speech, Dr. Castro addressed himself with cold contempt to the United States.

"The whole world is turning against you," he said.

The attitudes of both sides have set off so much bitterness that any immediate reconciliation, even if Cuba desired it, seems to be ruled out.

BITTER NOTES EXCHANGED

The relations between the two countries have become confined to economic reprisals and counter-reprisals, to the harassment of each other's citizens and to the exchange of bitter diplomatic notes. Recently, the Cubans have adopted the method of simply rejecting U.S. notes.

With the original U.S. policy of patience and tolerance finally abandoned and the new policy of toughness not offering clear-cut possibilities of the followup, relations seem destined to remain for a long time on this bitter and sterile level.

On the human level, the regime's anti-American campaign has not produced any pronounced sentiment against individual Americans in Cuba, although some incidents have occurred. The dominant feeling is of regret and bewilderment that relations should have deteriorated so badly.

Perhaps illustrative of the attitude of Cubans who are devoted followers of Dr. Castro was a penciled declaration in English ceremoniously handed to a U.S. newsman by a group of militia members at a refinery, belonging to a U.S. oil company, that was recently seized by the Government. It read:

"I am a Cuban worker. After my 8 hours of daily work, I do 6 hours of guard for Cuba and the revolution. We don't have nothing against American people, only with the monopolys and who back them, the Government. I have a brother in the United States of America. He is an American citizen. He fought in the last war. He continue being my brother. All the American citizens are welcome to Cuba, Free Territory of America."

LETTER OF TRANSMITTAL

U.S. SENATE, COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS
January 21, 1960.

Hon. J. W. FULBRIGHT,
Chairman, Committee on Foreign Relations, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I transmit herewith a report on a trip which I made as a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, November 1–19, 1959, to Venezuela, Brazil, Peru, Bolivia, and Panama. I was accompanied by Miss Lola Pierotti, my secretary, and Mr. Pat M. Holt of the Foreign Relations Committee staff.

Everywhere we were received most cordially and hospitably, and I take this opportunity publicly to record my thanks to all those who helped make the trip pleasant and instructive. I am especially grateful to our Foreign Service officers and other Government officials abroad; to the officials of the foreign governments who were most generous with their time; to the many private citizens, both Americans and foreigners, who gave me the benefit of their views and experience; and to the employees of the commercial airlines on which we traveled throughout.

Sincerely,

GEORGE D. AIKEN.

LATIN AMERICA: VENEZUELA, BRAZIL, PERU, BOLIVIA, AND PANAMA

INTRODUCTION

What the United States needs most in its Latin American policy is greater understanding of the problems and hopes of the Latin American people and greater evidence of sympathy with those problems and hopes.

This means primarily a greater adaptability in our policies, and especially in our public attitudes, to the profound and rapid changes which are taking place in Latin American politics, economics, and social structures.

It means recognition of the fact that Latin America is in a race between evolution and revolution. The crucial question is whether Latin American democratic political institutions are sturdy enough to bring about the needed economic and social reforms quickly enough. U.S. policy should be directed to helping this process through any appropriate means available.

This is the main conclusion drawn from a 3-week trip in November 1959 to five Latin American countries: Venezuela, Brazil, Peru, Bolivia, and Panama. In each country, I was thoroughly briefed by the top officials of the American Embassy, and I talked with the President, the Foreign Minister, and other officials, as well as with as many American and local businessmen, newspapermen, teachers, and missionaries as time would allow. I make no pretense of having found all the answers to the many problems we face in constructing a durable, effective Latin American policy. Few generalizations, other than the one stated above, apply across the board. Yet some things are clear:

1. The caliber of top government leadership in Latin America is generally first rate, and is thoroughly aware of the nature of the problems it faces. This is one of the most hopeful and encouraging aspects of the current scene.

2. U.S. business needs, and is getting, better public relations. Generally speaking, Americans can be proud of their top businessmen abroad, both as businessmen and as unofficial representatives of the United States. These businessmen themselves, however, are among the first to say that they have not always paid as much attention as they should have to their institutional public relations. This is now being corrected, the program in Venezuela being especially noteworthy. Progress is also being made in Brazil.

On the other hand, it must be added that one continues to hear complaints about the existence of American ghettoes and about the failure of American employees below the level of top management to make themselves a part of the local community, or who adopt superior attitudes and insist on living to themselves. Although such complaints may be justified as to some persons in some places, it is equally true that there are other Americans who do contribute much to local community endeavors such as health and welfare programs.

This situation points to the fact that in selecting personnel for foreign posts it is important that the members of a career employee's family and especially his wife should also fit well into the life and environment of the community.

3. Although the power of the military, generally speaking, has been reduced, it remains politically influential. A reduction in military expenditures would not only free resources badly needed for economic purposes but would also strengthen civilian control of the military. The United States should support such a trend, either through regional arms limitations agreements or otherwise, and should at the same time adopt a tougher attitude toward requests for military assistance.

4. The United States should adopt a more realistic lending policy. Specifically, the United States should be less dogmatic in regard to loans for government enterprises, as for example oil development, and more forthcoming in regard to loans for social reform or welfare projects, as for example housing or land redistribution.

5. The United States needs a more liberal trade policy, particularly as regards imports of such commodities as oil, lead, and zinc. This is especially important in view of the growing pressure within Latin America for more protectionist policies to aid industrialization. These pressures, which will hit American exports hardest, will be more difficult to resist if the United States itself is following a protectionist course. At the same time, one must recognize the validity of Latin American desires to develop their own manufacturing establishments. A happy solution might be found in a suggestion I heard from a Latin American importer who was concerned about the effect on his business of high tariffs designed to protect the local textile industry. He pointed out that instead of giving the local industry a chance to grow, these tariffs in fact protected inefficiency and high-cost production. His suggestion was that instead of tariffs local industries be helped by such measures as aid for modernization, machinery imports, technical assistance, and perhaps even tax concessions. This would give them a chance to be competitive with imports, and in turn the competition of imports would lead to increased local efficiency.

6. Both Congress and the administration should give further consideration to the policy questions involved in using, or not using, American aid programs to develop the production abroad of commodities surplus in the United States. A rigid policy of not assisting in the production of such commodities may at times be self-defeating, and a more pragmatic, case-by-case approach should be adopted.

The case for refusing to promote any foreign production of a commodity which is surplus in the United States is based on the premise that such foreign production would either (a) reduce a market for American exports, or (b) provide additional competition for American exports in world markets. It is the first of these putative results which particularly requires reexamination. The question that must be asked is whether a particular country would in fact be a market for a particular commodity if it did not produce the commodity. The answer in many cases is likely to be negative in the absence of American aid or export subsidies, because the country simply will not have the necessary foreign exchange.

To cite a specific example, Bolivia badly needs increased production in all fields. One of the factors limiting the growth of the small Bolivian textile industry is the necessity to import cotton. Cotton production could probably be increased in eastern Bolivia; but the United States will not do anything to help, because cotton is surplus in the United States.

Bolivian wheat production has declined from 42,000 tons in 1950–51 to 20,000 tons last year, largely because of the U.S. wheat import program and the discouragement of local production.

If one could foresee a time when Bolivia would be an important commercial outlet for our wheat and cotton, this policy would make more sense. But Bolivian imports are now largely subsidized by the United States, either through Public Law 480 or the ICA commodity import program, and our policy in this respect is more likely to continue the dependence of Bolivia than it is to promote the economic development of that country.

For a country such as this one, it would seem more sensible to concentrate on the production of whatever can be produced in the hope that this will eventually generate enough wealth and purchasing power to make possible the sale, on a commercial, nonsubsidized basis, of other U.S. goods.

7. Many Latin Americans fail to make a distinction between the U.S. Government, on the one hand, and such international organizations as the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and the International Monetary Fund, on the other. The identification of the Bank and the Fund with the United States is increased when a local representative of one of these agencies is an American. Particularly in a country where the Fund is the sponsor of an unpopular policy, it would seem desirable that the Fund's local representative not be an American national.

8. The exchange of persons program should be expanded and a broader range of persons selected for study and travel in the United States. To the extent necessary, a liberal visa policy should be applied; and if legislation is necessary, the administration should submit appropriate recommendations to Congress. In Bolivia, for example, I was told of one leftist student who was sent to the United States under this program. Firsthand acquaintance with democratic institutions completely changed his outlook on governmental philosophies. As president of the students' union in one of Bolivia's principal cities, he now holds a position of considerable influence. In Venezuela, the Communists have invited virtually every important labor leader to visit the Soviet Union. The United States is unable to issue invitations on similar scale because of lack of funds. Further, in Venezuela, Bolivia, and elsewhere, many labor leaders and intellectuals have radical backgrounds of a character which engenders a reluctance to invite them to this country where they may observe the workings and advantages of our democratic system. I would not be afraid to let them compare our institutions with what they have been taught about communism, for such opportunity could only react to our benefit.

9. All appropriate support should be given to binational cultural centers, and greater efforts should be made through these centers and otherwise to reach the working classes, on the one hand, and students both on the secondary and university level, on the other. I was able to visit binational centers in Caracas, Rio, and La Paz, and I was impressed with the work they are doing and with their potentialities for doing even greater good. These centers are almost entirely self-supporting, deriving their revenues from fees for teaching English, and receive only marginal support from the United States, mainly in the form of a limited number of personnel and library books. Although a large program of American support would destroy their binational character, it would be feasible to extend more aid than is now being given. Many of the centers are inadequately housed; and although a large construction program would be unwarranted, some relief could be given through the use, where available, of foreign currencies derived from Public Law 480, through a revolving fund which would make long-term, low-interest loans to the centers.

I also visited several libraries maintained by the U.S. Information Service. These libraries were all well patronized by the local people, with a high percentage of teenagers among these patrons. Unfortunately, many of our libraries were short of material and facilities, a situation which ought to be corrected.

Although I did not have an opportunity actually to visit any American-sponsored schools, I was favorably impressed by what I was told of their work by American businessmen. Aid to these schools, especially in construction, would likewise seem to be a good use for Public Law 480 currencies.

10. The diversity of Latin America is insufficiently taken into account in most North American discussions of the area. The North American image of Latin America is not only distorted, in that it tends to view the area as homogeneous, but also outdated.

Why this should be so is one of the more puzzling facets of our present world position. American investment in Latin America exceeds that in any other area of the world except Canada. American tourists in Latin America equal or exceed those in any other area of the world. Yet American universities devote more attention, and American newspapers devote more space, to Europe and Asia; and it is probably correct to say that the American man on the street is at least as familiar with Burma as with Bolivia.

American foreign policy is frequently criticized on the ground that it fails to make the United States understood abroad, and there is substance to this complaint. But we are understood at least as well in Latin America as Latin America is understood in the United States. International understanding, in this sense, is a two-way street, and both North Americans and Latin Americans have much to do to improve their mutual knowledge of each other. It might be worth while to explore, in the Organization of American States, the desirability and feasibility of establishing in the United States institutes comparable to the binational centers which have been so successful in Latin America.

11. It is difficult to reach any assessment of which one can be reasonably confident of Communist strength and activity. One recurring phenomenon worth reporting, however, is a trend among Latin American Communists toward placing increasing emphasis on China and decreasing emphasis on the Soviet Union. This seems to be based on the thesis that China's problems are more closely akin to those of Latin America (the Soviet Union having become too highly developed and industrialized) and that only in China is the true Communist faith still to be found (the Soviet Union under Khrushchev having been guilty of rightist deviations).

12. Although it would be incorrect to say that anti-Americanism does not exist, this phenomenon is sometimes exaggerated and frequently misinterpreted. Criticism of U.S. policies—some of which comes from some of our best friends—is certainly not to be equated with anti-Americanism, nor are manifestations which are superficially directed against the United States but which actually arise from feelings of nationalism coupled sometimes with hopelessness and despair. The United States is frequently used as a scapegoat to rationalize frustrations over economic and social conditions. This is a part of the price of being rich and powerful. It can perhaps be ameliorated by wise and subtle policies aimed at removing the cause of the frustrations or at diverting the energies generated by them into constructive channels.

Venezuela

Venezuela is going through an exciting period of political, economic, and social reform. The overthrow of the Perez Jimenez dictatorship in January 1958 revealed a country in wreckage—without solid political institutions, with a large short-term foreign debt, expensive domestic commitments in the form of elaborate unfinished public works showpieces, mounting social problems resulting from the unequal distribution of land and income, and from the growth of urban slums to accommodate immigrants from the countryside.

In the intervening 2 years, remarkable progress has been made. Free and honest elections have been held and political power transferred to the winning candidates. About $750 million, or one-half of the old regime's short-term obligations, has been paid. And the new Government has launched a broad program of land reform, agricultural development, housing, and education designed to raise standards of living not just for the handful of nouveau riche but for everyone. Coupled with this is a program of economic diversification to reduce the country's dependence on oil, a commodity which in recent years has accounted for more than 90 percent of Venezuela's foreign exchange earnings.

Much, however, remains to be done. Before the elections of December 1958 which elevated Romulo Betancourt to the Presidency, the three principal parties agreed that the new Government would be a coalition. The agreement has been kept, not without all of the difficulties inherent in a coalition government plus some others which are unique to Venezuela. More time and more experience with democratic processes, which unfortunately have not been often followed in Venezuelan history, are necessary to establish firm political institutions. To gain this time, the Betancourt government must find ways to withstand the stresses and strains of coalition politics, and it must also make demonstrable progress in social and economic reform.

To this considerable task, the Government brings formidable resources, not the least of which are the character and ability of President Betancourt himself and many of the other principal political leaders. In addition, Venezuela, despite its current economic difficulties, is far from an impoverished country. Its gross national product in 1958, for a population of only 6.6 million, was roughly $7 billion—on a per capita basis by far the highest in Latin America and comparable to the more developed countries of Western Europe.

On the other hand, the Government is subject to constant harassment from the Communists, who are not included in the coalition government, and from a variety of other sources of discontent. The figures of per capita gross national product conceal extraordinary variations from great wealth to extreme poverty. Of 400,000 farm units in the country, for example, two-thirds are less than 12½ acres and 14 percent are less than 2½ acres. Three-quarters of the agricultural land is in 6,700 units of 2,500 or more acres. And only 25 percent of all farm units are operated by their owners. In industry, Venezuela's oil workers are among the highest paid in the world. The cost per man to the Creole Petroleum Corp. in Venezuela exceeds that to the Humble Oil Co. in Texas. Workers paid on a daily basis average $23 a day in wages and benefits, of which approximately one-third is basic wage, one-third overtime and travel pay, and one-third in fringe benefits. But oil workers account for only 40,000 people out of a labor force of approximately 2 million, and wage scales in other industries are much below those in oil. Further, unemployment has grown in the last year as industries have introduced laborsaving devices and as the Government has slowed public works projects in the interests of economy.

The fruits of economic diversification, of land reform, of housing and education cannot be harvested overnight. These programs are expensive; and though basically wealthy, Venezuela is currently short of cash. There is a further question of how far industrialization can go in a country with a market of only 6.6 million people. Some sort of economic union with its neighbors would broaden the market but would cause other problems because Venezuela is a high-cost producer and initially, at least, would have trouble competing.

It is important to the United States that responsible representative government succeed in Venezuela. One of the complaints which is frequently heard about the United States in Venezuela and elsewhere in Latin America is that it views liberal reform governments askance and does not really care about social progress. This complaint is often exaggerated, but it is believed by many people. Here in Venezuela is a chance to demonstrate that the reverse is true and that the United States in fact has far more in common with democrats like Betancourt than with dictators like Perez Jimenez.

The positive steps which the United States can take to help Venezuela are limited. But we ought also to avoid steps which are harmful One of these was our action imposing quotas on imports of Venezuelan oil, the mischievous effects of which were compounded, so far as Venezuela is concerned, when we later exempted imports from Canada and Mexico. The Venezuelans feel that this exemption discriminates against them. They point out that they are almost as close as Texas ports to the U.S. east coast, and they feel that if we must have oil import quotas, there should be special consideration on a hemispheric basis, not limited simply to Canada and Mexico.

There is much to be said against oil import quotas from the point of view of our own domestic self-interest. Aside from the feeling of hurt which was needlessly engendered in Venezuela, there is more to be said against quotas from the point of view of our foreign trade interests.

As has been pointed out, oil exports provide more than 90 percent of Venezuela's foreign exchange earnings. Venezuela is the fifth biggest market in the world for American exports, and it provides the second largest market in Latin America for U.S. agricultural products. This becomes the more impressive when measured against the size of the Venezuelan population.

Although it had not, as of late 1959, submitted specific proposals, the Venezuelan Government has given notice that it wants to revise the United States-Venezuelan trade agreement, and all the signs indicate that the Venezuelans will adopt a more protectionist attitude in order to stimulate the development of local industry and agriculture. The more the United States itself adopts a protectionist attitude toward a single commodity, in this case oil, the more it weakens its position to resist such an attitude on the part of others.

It should also be remembered that American investments in Venezuela amount to $2.9 billion, more than twice as much as in any other single country in Latin America. Most of this is, of course, in petroleum; but there are also substantial investments in iron mining, in distributive industries, and—to a lesser extent—in assembly and manufacture. Venezuela has had such large foreign exchange earnings from petroleum that until recently imports have been no problem. Many American firms, as a consequence, have established large sales outlets in Venezuela, but do not engage there in assembly or manufacture. With Venezuela temporarily short of foreign exchange and with protectionist sentiment growing, these firms are likely to find themselves under pressure to produce more inside Venezuela instead of simply importing foreign goods for sale in Venezuela.

Brazil

Nowhere is the race between economic growth and economic chaos more evident and dramatic than in Brazil. The country suffers from historic and chronic inflation (1,600 percent since 1939; 40 percent in the first 8 months of 1959). In addition, with the drop in world coffee prices in recent years, there has been an international balance of payments deficit in the magnitude of $300 million a year. At the same time, Brazil has undergone rapid industrialization; and under the administration of President Kubitschek, who was elected in 1955, the Government has undertaken large public works projects, notably roads, hydroelectric power, and the building of the new capital of Brasilia.

To a large degree, Brazil's economic problems result from the rapidity of its development. Some of the budgetary and investment policies of the Brazilian Government—principally deficit financing and expansion of the money supply—have contributed to the continuing domestic inflation and depreciation of the cruzeiro. Further, the growth of industry, which is especially noticeable in São Paulo, has contributed to balance-of-payments deficits by increasing the demand for imports and reducing the quantity and variety of goods available for export. For example, although Brazilian oil production has increased 20 times in 5 years, all of this has been absorbed through increased domestic demand and oil imports have remained fairly steady at about $250 million a year. Similarly, cotton exports have declined from $250 million in 1953 to about $25 million last year, in part because of decreased production but also and importantly because of increased domestic demand due to the growth of local textile manufacturing.

However, at the same time that industrialization and the Government's public works program are causing serious economic problems, they are also increasing the real wealth of the country. The big question is whether the production resulting from this increased wealth will manifest itself before the country goes bankrupt in terms of its currency and its international accounts.

This is a question which has put the U.S. Government and the International Monetary Fund, on the one hand, and the Brazilian Government, on the other, at loggerheads. The United States and the IMF emphasize the necessity for deflationary policies to protect the currency, even at the expense of a reduction in investment and the rate of growth. The Brazilian Government emphasizes the necessity for continued growth, even at the expense of inflation.

There is much to be said for both positions. In the absence of measures to correct Brazil's international deficit, it would certainly not do any lasting good to extend further balance-of-payments help simply to underwrite a continuation of that deficit. At the same time, it is easy to be misled by economic statistics, especially if one is a classical economist looking at the statistics several thousand miles from the scene. The figures do not convey the atmosphere of febrile development and change with which one is struck in Rio de Janeiro and São Paulo. Nor do they convey the determination for growth with which one is struck in an interview with President Kubitschek, an able and dedicated man.

On balance, it seems to me that the Kubitschek policies have been rather too harshly assessed in Washington. Granted the monetary and fiscal chaos with which Brazil is threatened, the fact remains that if the projects initiated by Kubitschek are successfully completed, they will make an immeasurable contribution to the future development of Brazil. The removal of the capital to Brasilia and the opening up of roads in the interior will stimulate the settlement of the vast open spaces of Brazil and may well have an impact similar to the opening of the American West 100 years ago. This is a sound investment, and any American who feels like criticizing it as unnecessarily expensive should first review the 19th century economic history of his own country.

There are many ways in which the United States could aid Brazilian development without resorting to balance-of-payments loans. For example, if Petrobras, the Brazilian Government oil monopoly, had additional capital to expand its production more rapidly, material foreign exchange savings could be made through a reduction in oil imports. The refusal of the United States to deal with Petrobras, simply because it is a Government monopoly, seems altogether too doctrinaire. It further seems inconsistent in the light of substantial Export-Import Bank loans to develop Brazilian Government steel production.

The impasse in United States-Brazilian economic relations has aggravated a widespread Brazilian feeling that the United States has shamefully neglected Brazil, its tried and true friend of long standing, and is indifferent to Brazil's problems. This feeling is frequently so exaggerated that it seems irrational to a North American; but, irrational or not, it exists and must be taken into account in any assessment of U.S. policy toward Brazil. I arrived in Rio on the day President Eisenhower's itinerary to Asia, Africa, and Europe was announced, and it was obvious that many Brazilians were hurt that the American President would go to Afghanistan and Morocco but not to the largest country of Latin America. The President's forthcoming trip to Brazil will no doubt do much to assuage these feelings and will serve, in addition, as a positive token of the importance which the United States attaches to its relations with Brazil.

It will not serve its full purpose, however, if it is only an isolated incident. There is enough truth in the Brazilian complaints of neglect to warrant continued, careful attention in Washington. After all, Brazil is the biggest and potentially the richest and strongest Latin American power. It has traditionally been one of the most world minded of the Latin American States, and in many international meetings over the years Brazilian voices have spoken eloquently and courageously on the side of human freedom and dignity. U.S. private investment in Brazil amounts to $1.3 billion, and United States-Brazilian trade totals $1 billion a year both ways.

Operation Pan America, suggested a year and a half ago by President Kubitschek, is an ambitious, imaginative proposal for furthering hemispheric unity as well as promoting hemispheric economic development.

In this respect and in others, the contribution which Brazil is making to the cause of inter-American relations deserves more recognition than it has always received. And in the day-to-day conduct of affairs more little attentions from Washington would reap rich dividends of cooperation and good will in Rio.

Meanwhile, it should be recognized that, almost regardless of what the United States does or does not do, the coming months will be difficult and delicate ones in United States-Brazilian relations. Brazil is holding a presidential election in October (President Kubitschek is ineligible to succeed himself). During the period of the campaign, particularly if the economic situation continues to worsen, it must be expected that the United States will be made a scapegoat.

Peru

The crucial question in Peru is whether or not the Indian half of the population will enter modern society on the democratic side of the fence. The answer to this question is likely to be found in whether Peru can move ahead with social and economic reform fast enough by evolutionary means or whether social and economic pressures will build up to a revolutionary explosion.

The Indians are concentrated in the high Andes, and have some difficulty adjusting themselves, both physiologically and psychologically, to the sea level, Europeanized environment of lovely, sophisticated Lima. To a considerable degree, they have been cut off, culturally and economically, as well as physically, from the predominant minority of the Peruvian population which is of European descent. These barriers are being inexorably broken down by technological change and economic growth, but meanwhile they complicate considerably all the usual problems created by gross maldistribution of wealth and income.

The question of land is illustrative of the race between reform and revolution in Peru. The law now makes it virtually impossible for an Indian to buy land even if he has money. Amendments to this law are under consideration, as are other moderate steps. One of these would be expansion of agricultural credit. Another would be a system of progressive taxation of land, under which holdings above a specified size would be taxed at a higher rate so as to provide an incentive either for the breakup of large estates or for their more efficient use. But, at the same time, there is great pressure for more radical measures, and the longer moderate steps are postponed, the greater this pressure will become.

In Pedro Beltran, Peru has an able, clear-sighted, courageous Prime Minister who has made encouraging progress in putting Peru on a sound economic footing and who is trying to do something about some of the country's social problems. Beltran is particularly interested in getting a housing program under way through creation of savings and loan institutions, for which he needs a loan of approximately $1.5 million from the Development Loan Fund. The Beltran housing program is particularly appealing because it would serve a dual purpose. First, of course, it would stimulate badly needed housing construction. Second, it would be a big step toward the establishment of the kind of economic institutions which are so conspicuously lacking in most of Latin America. A savings and loan association, for example, performs valuable social and economic functions beyond its simple day-to-day business transactions. It provides a means for creating capital, a means whereby savings of thousands of people in amounts which are individually insignificant can be mobilized and brought together in amounts which are meaningful. It provides, in short, a beginning toward broadening and institutionalizing the process of capital formation, and this may well be a more significant longrun contribution than any short-term improvement in housing.

This Peruvian housing program deserves more sympathetic consideration than it has apparently yet received from the Development Loan Fund, and the long delay in taking action on the request for this loan is inexcusable.

Under Beltran and President Manuel Prado, the Peruvian Government has also taken a leading role in proposals for a regional arms limitation agreement. Such an agreement would solve the problems caused by what many Latin Americans feel are excessive military expenditures which in turn result from what other Latin Americans feel is the necessity for maintaining military superiority over, or at least parity with, their neighbors. Both of these needs—i.e., that for military security and that for government economy—could be met if the nations of Latin America, or any substantial number of them contiguous to each other, could agree on arms limitations to be guaranteed by the Organization of American States. There is much interest, not only in Peru but elsewhere, in such proposals, and they deserve the wholehearted support of the United States.

The subject is, however, a complicated one. Among its several aspects are these:

From the military point of view, no Latin American military establishment is capable of sustained, large-scale operations comparable to those conducted by any of the major belligerents in the two World Wars, and intrahemispheric military operations seem unlikely. On the Continent of South America, although some international animosities exist, they do not seem sufficiently severe to erupt into warfare. Tensions are greater in Central America and the Caribbean, but the OAS has frequently demonstrated its ability to cope with localized outbreaks and to restore peace. It is difficult, therefore, to make a military case for Latin American military establishments beyond the kinds of national guards which are maintained by Costa Rica and Panama.

From the economic point of view, it would seem that every Latin American country could put to better use much of the resources now devoted to military establishments.

From the political point of view, two things are involved, and these must be carefully balanced. Although the political power of the military is less now than formerly, it remains a force to be reckoned with in many Latin American countries, and civilian governments exercise no more than an uneasy control. Parts of the military budgets of some Latin American countries are in effect appeasement of the military—something to keep them happy so that they will not overthrow the government. A reduction of military expenditures, which would weaken the military, would make it easier for civilian governments to assert more nearly complete control. But a reduction which is too abrupt or drastic might well encounter so much military opposition as to endanger the stability of civilian governments.

Joint international action, preferably through the OAS, seems the best way out of this dilemma, and the United States should, as previously stated, lend its support to proposals for such action. In the meantime, the United States should also take a more hardboiled attitude toward Latin American requests for military assistance, but it would seem impolitic at this time to cut off all military assistance abruptly. We could, however, set such a goal over a period of years and announce that we were moving toward it. Finally, we should use whatever influence we have in Western Europe to persuade our friends there not to use Latin America as an outlet for their surplus military equipment or for their armaments industries.

Bolivia

Bolivia is a country which has produced a political miracle and is now waiting for an economic one.

The political miracle lies in the thoroughness of the revolution of 1952 and in the fact that it has been followed by the most stable government in Bolivia's national history.

The magniture of the political and social change which Bolivia has undergone in the last 8 years can scarcely be overstated. Before 1952, the bulk of the Bolivian people lived in a condition which can only be described as serfdom. Peasants were forbidden to enter the main square of La Paz. They were bound to the land, they were obligated to give a specified number of days of personal service to their landlord, and they were lucky if they had anything more than a poncho to wear and a bare subsistence diet, supplemented by coca leaves to dull the hunger pains. Virtually overnight, political power was effectively transferred to the mass of peasants and workers (mainly miners) from a handful of military officers and largely absentee owners of lands and mines. Furthermore, the transfer is permanent. Even if the present regime in Bolivia should fail, something new will take its place; there will never be a return to the conditions which existed before 1952.

A revolution so thoroughgoing as this inevitably brings enormous problems in its wake, even though it came off in a few days and with little bloodshed. It is all the more remarkable, therefore, that Bolivia has enjoyed the greatest political stability in its history in the intervening years, and has in addition made measurable progress.

The rights of citizenship, with universal suffrage, have been extended to all Bolivians. A far-reaching program of land reform has been instituted and is being carried out—too rapidly for some of its conservative critics, too slowly for some of its beneficiary peasants. The tin mines of the three big mining companies—Aramayo, Hochschild, and Patino—have been nationalized. Various social welfare programs, with emphasis upon education, have been inaugurated. The military has been thoroughly purged of antirevolutionary elements and set to work on a variety of civilian projects, such as road- and bridge-building. One engineer battalion even runs a sawmill. (This use of the military for civilian activities, after the manner of the Army Engineers in the United States or the old Civilian Conservation Corps, provides a model which could be usefully studied for wider application in Latin America.)

It is not surprising that, in the circumstances, both mining and agricultural production have declined and costs have gone up. Mine workers, to whom the revolutionary government was politically indebted anyhow, felt that, after nationalization of the mines, there was some magic whereby they could live off the mines without really working in them. Peasants lacked the technical knowledge to farm their new lands efficiently and, after centuries of ruthless exploitation, had developed ingrained habits of working as little as possible to get by.

Notwithstanding these troubles, many Bolivians seem to be better off than before. More peasants who formerly went barefooted now have shoes—or at least sandals. More who formerly walked now have bicycles. The country now has more doctors and more schools.

The problems of production, which could normally be expected to work themselves out in time, have been compounded by a sharp drop in the world price of tin coming hard on the heels of the revolution, and also by the obsolescence and wearing out of the machinery used to operate the mines. Tin accounts for 58 percent of Bolivia's foreign exchange earnings, and the lower price meant a reduced Bolivian ability to import. Further, a system of multiple exchange rates in effect before 1956 encouraged smuggling of goods out of the country.

All of this, as well as other factors, gave Bolivia one of the world's worst inflations. The boliviano fell from an official exchange rate of 190 to the dollar to 14,000 to the dollar in late 1956 just before a comprehensive stabilization plan was put into effect and a free, single exchange system adopted. The plan has worked reasonably well, and for most of 1959 the boliviano was fairly steady at 12,000 to the dollar and there was no substantial change in internal prices.

The big unanswered question in Bolivia is what happens next. Stabilization has been achieved but stabilization is only a means to an end; it is not an end in itself. The disturbing thing about Bolivia is that no one seems really to know what happens or what ought to happen next. The country clearly needs an economic miracle and is waiting for one. Indeed, a sort of Micawberish atmosphere—"something will turn up"—prevails almost everywhere.

Some people think the miracle will come through the development of low-grade mineral ores. There are plans for this but little evidence of action, though the initial capital required is fairly small.

Other people think the miracle lies in the potential agricultural production of Bolivia's vast expanses of undeveloped jungle or semijungle land in the eastern part of the country. With much help, both in machinery and technical assistance from the International Cooperation Administration a valiant effort was made to develop the Santa Cruz area and some success was achieved. But the dominant thinking now is that Santa Cruz is less suited for this purpose than Beni, another lowland area to the east of La Paz and closer to the centers of population. Work is now going forward on a road to that area; and one can hear it said in La Paz that this is the true answer to the problem and that the road from Cochabamba to Santa Cruz, built with an Export-Import Bank loan, was at best unnecessarily elaborate, and at worst misplaced.

Still other people, perhaps most, are looking for the miracle in the form of a big oil strike, and several American companies are indeed conducting extensive explorations under a beneficent government petroleum code. The oilmen themselves, perhaps from hard experience, seem rather more skeptical than others about their prospects of success. In any event, the problems of production and transportation in Bolivia are so immense that major discoveries would have to be made for the operation to be worthwhile and to make any critical difference in the Bolivian economy.

Meanwhile, YPFB, the Bolivian Government petroleum company, which is not a monopoly, is producing enough oil to take care of all of Bolivia's needs except those for aviation gasoline and lubricating oils. YPFB, however, needs additional funds to modernize its equipment, carry on exploration, and provide working capital. If YPFB should become insolvent, the political consequences would be far reaching and could jeopardize the position of private American oil companies in Bolivia.

Since 1953 the United States has aided Bolivia to the extent of $20 to $30 million a year, mostly to help the Bolivian Government make up its budgetary deficit. A minor portion of the aid has gone for technical assistance, and this has produced the most solid, lasting results, especially in health, education, and agriculture. Many things could doubtless be said in criticism of the budgetary aid program, the most telling of which would be that it was inadequately planned. Yet the circumstances under which it was necessarily carried out offer a large measure of extenuation. Although hindsight may reveal how the aid program could have been carried on more effectively, it also reveals no alternative to that program except utter chaos.

Nor, regrettably, does such foresight as I am able to bring to bear reveal an acceptable alternative to continuing the aid program. Barring the economic miracle for which Bolivia is waiting, it will be a long time—longer, I fear, than many people think—before the country is self-supporting.

The question might well be raised at this point as to what real interest the United States has in preventing utter chaos in Bolivia. The answer is plain. We know where the present regime in Bolivia is going. It is going—slowly and haltingly, to be sure, but going nevertheless—in the direction of a liberal democracy. We do not know where any successor regime which might emerge from utter chaos would go. Nor should it be forgotten that Bolivia is either the only or the main Western Hemisphere source of supply of tin and of several other metals. And that what happens in Bolivia will have repercussions beyond its borders.

Panama

Panama has about 1 million people who are very poor and about 50 families who are very rich. It also has the Canal Zone with about 3,500 Americans, all of whom are rich.

relative to most Panamanians, and many of whom obviously feel themselves the social superiors of all Panamanians.

Given the economic and social conditions which exist in Panama, it is not surprising that there should be widespread unrest. Indeed, the surprising thing is that there has not been more.

Panama has historically lived off its geography—first through the transshipment of Spanish gold from the west coast of South America to the Caribbean; then through the transit of fortune hunters and supplies during the California gold rush; and finally in the 20th century off the canal. Aside from some banana plantations and shrimp fisheries, the country has few other resources that are developed, though it has considerable agricultural land that could be developed. In its history, Panama has had only the most fleeting periods of social reform, and it has only recently begun to be touched by the wave of reform movements which are agitating much of the rest of Latin America.

In this situation, the United States offers a natural and inviting target. It would be attractive to demagogs in any event. It becomes irresistible in view of the need for an outlet for popular unrest which might otherwise be directed against the Panamanian oligarchy.

This, I think is the real explanation for the demonstrations of November 3 and 28, 1959. It is an explanation which goes far deeper than Panamanian desires to fly the Panamanian flag in the Canal Zone or dissatisfication over such issues as Canal Zone employment or third-country purchases. It indicates, also, that given a continuation of the present framework of United States-Panamanian relations, there is no end to our troubles in that country. As long as Panama remains an oligarchical society, there will continue to be unrest in the country. And as long as the United States presence in Panama remains so overwhelming, there will continue to be Panamanian agitation over something relating to the canal, regardless of whatever concessions the United States might make. The end result would be either holding the Canal Zone by force or withdrawing completely. The first alternative is perhaps militarily feasible, but it is wholly impractical politically in the 20th century. It would do untold permanent damage to our political position throughout Latin America—and Asia and Africa, too, for that matter. The second alternative is also distasteful and would, indeed, not solve any of Panama's problems, all of which are basically unrelated to the canal.

It might be argued from this that the United States should now adopt a hard, no-appeasement, no-concession attitude and stick with it come what may. This would be a mistake. It would invite a repetition of the incidents of November 3 on a grander scale and would hasten the day when the United States holds the Canal Zone only by walling it off with a line of American bayonets. This is not a pretty picture and we may be sure the Communists would see that it got wide distribution throughout the world.

Should the situation continue to deteriorate as now seems likely, we would do better to contemplate and explore fundamental changes which would reduce the American presence in Panama and enable us to share with others the political liabilities inherent in maintaining and operating the canal. One means of doing this would be through internationalizing the canal and thereby multilateralizing the problems attendant upon it.

Both the OAS and the United Nations offer possible mechanisms. Of the two, the U.N. seems preferable, because the canal's importance is worldwide rather than hemispheric and because most of the principal shipping nations are not in the OAS. Perhaps the best arrangement would be a new agency composed of the leading shipping nations of the world.

The details of what is ultimately worked out are not now so important as willingness in the United States to explore the idea of internationalization dispassionately and objectively. The idea will no doubt strike many Americans as heresy, or worse. A calm appraisal of the problem, however, will reveal this proposal as more meritorious than it may at first seem. Adequate, foolproof safeguards to protect our own basic interests, as well as those of other maritime nations, would, of course, have to be written into any international agreement. This should not prove an insuperable obstacle, because continued efficient operation of the canal is as much in the interest of the world community as it is in ours. Further, the importance of the canal is now largely commercial. The construction of naval vessels too large to use the canal and the development of missiles have greatly reduced the canal's importance to our national defense; and this trend will continue.

Finally, it should be noted that this proposal will undoubtedly be strongly opposed by Panama, because, among other reasons, it would remove—or at least reduce—a convenient outlet for Panamanian social and economic frustrations. Panamanians will, however, be hard pressed to find persuasive arguments against it, if it is put forward in good faith and in good time by the United States and if it finds general support among other nations. It is important that the initiative in the matter come from the United States and that it comes gracefully and opportunely. We ought not to wait so long that it appears we are being pushed into a solution, perhaps a less desirable one, grudgingly and against our will.

In the meantime, there are a number of other things which could be done to ease the immediate situation (though on this score it must be remembered that Panama will have a national election in May of this year and some rather flamboyant campaign oratory must be expected). The several immediate points at issue between the United States and Panama are complicated and not clear cut on the merits. Without passing on the merits, it seems to me that the executive branch of the U.S. Government has too often been inexcusably slow in making up its mind as to precisely what its position is. This is probably a natural result of the fact that the Canal Zone is under the control of the Defense Department, while it is the State Department and the American Embassy in Panama which must deal with the Panamanian Government. Adequate steps should be taken to insure clear, top-level policy decisions in a reasonable time, and these steps should give recognition to the fact that the Canal Zone (more so than the canal itself) is the overwhelmingly predominant factor in our foreign relations with Panama.

It would be useful, also, if ways and means could be found to reduce the number of Americans resident in the Canal Zone. One of the constant sources of friction with Panama is the operation of post exchanges in the zone and the question of who does and does not have PX privileges and what the PX's may or may not sell. Americans have made the Canal Zone a little island of luxury in a sea of poverty. Further, it is my impression that most Americans living in the zone are culturally isolated from Panama. Yet these Americans have responsibilities above and beyond those they would have if they were employed in similar work in the United States. Judging from results, however, it would seem that the Defense Department and the Panama Canal Company are doing precious little to encourage the carrying out of these responsibilities.

Panama owes its existence as a nation primarily to the support and encouragement it received from the United States in the early days of its independence. Panamanians who are tempted to revile the United States should remember this.

The United States, on the other hand, should not be complacent over the abject poverty which exists in Panama. We do have a special responsibility in Panama and should meet it with consideration and understanding.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. AIKEN. I would like to say that, as usual, the Senator from Montana has delivered in this Chamber a well prepared and thought-provoking address. I might go even further and say it is one of the best addresses the Senator from Montana has delivered in this Chamber, if not the best.

He has presented to this body the general situation as regards the relationship of the United States and the other countries of the Western Hemisphere. He not only has presented the situation with great accuracy, but he has also presented an approach to meeting the problems which we have before us.

I do not say that every detail of the proposal of the Senator from Montana is just what I would agree with, or what this body would agree with, or what the public would agree with; but, he is offering us an excellent approach to the problem which is before us.

I think it should be understood that to carry out the proposals of the Senator from Montana will take some time; 21, or I believe it is 22, nations, including Canada, working together, cannot overnight agree on common action. We certainly could not get them to agree on a common market without a great deal of debate, consideration, and delay; and the Senator from Montana has recognized this fact in his address by stating that it would take time.

I think we would all agree that we should make a prompt start in this direction if we are eventually to achieve our objectives.

I am very much interested, Mr. President, in comparing the address of the Senator from Montana with the message received from the President of the United States by the Senate today.

The President, it is true, did not go into any specific matters. He simply asked for an authorization of $600 million with which to deal with our Latin American problems. As I understand it, that authorization does not mean he wants the money appropriated right now, but he wants something to manifest the sincerity and the earnestness of the United States Government in approaching this problem.

Furthermore, it is my understanding that of the $600 million authorization which is requested, up to $100 million is desired to meet the emergency conditions which have created in Chile due to the long series of earthquakes with which that unfortunate country has been afflicted during recent weeks and months, and which many of us here on the floor have stated the United States ought to do something about.

I cannot help but think that the request of the President and the speech and recommendations of the Senator from Montana are directed to the same end objectives—raising the living standards of the Western Hemisphere, improving the economic conditions of the people of the Western Hemisphere, and making more secure the Democratic institutions of the Western Hemisphere.

I am delighted we received both the message of the President and the address of the Senator from Montana on the same day.

It seems to me the resolution which has been submitted by the Senator from Montana and the request made by the President for authorization of $600 million for Latin American operations could well complement each other; and that if we grant the authorization, or such part of it as the Congress sees fit to grant, or adopt a resolution which would achieve the purpose of the Senator from Montana—I do not say it would be exactly the same wording—then when the meetings of the Latin American States are held in Bogota and other places during this fall we would be in a position to prove and to show conclusively to the countries of South America, Central America, and North America, that we do mean business in this respect.

It is one of the most encouraging moves I have seen for a long time. I refer to the obvious realization—and I am sure our country realizes it, along with the Senator from Montana and the President—that while we may have problems all over the world, no problems are more important for solution than the problems of the Western Hemisphere itself.

So I hope that, after this splendid speech of the Senator, the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee will, without delay, call hearings on the resolution which has been submitted by the Senator from Montana, so we may get public opinion, the opinion of our officials in the executive branch, and others who desire to appear as witnesses, and get something constructive and conclusive done before this special session of Congress permanently adjourns—and I hope that will be very soon.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I am indebted to the Senator from Vermont for his kind remarks and encouraged by what he had to say as being his definition of what the administration's viewpoint very likely will be.

It will be my hope that the administration would give proper and due consideration to the resolution entered today, in accordance with its expressed desire for a $600 million authorization contained in the message to the Congress received today.

I agree with the Senator from Vermont that there is probably more in common and less in divergence between the expressions contained in the speech today and the expressions of the administration; and I would hope that out of these proposals and this debate would come a recognition of the need for a new kind of program for all of Latin America, a recognition of the fact that we ought no longer to be the unilateral dispenser, but that there must be an integrated, cooperative effort on the part of all the nations of the Western Hemisphere, to the end that the common welfare of the hemisphere can be furthered.

The purpose, of course, as the Senator from Vermont has expressed it so well, is to try to bring about, at long last, a real recognition of just how important Latin America is to us and, by the same token, how important we are to Latin America. Our destiny is wrapped up together. Our needs, while divergent in some respects, are parallel in others.

I would hope, out of the meeting of the foreign ministers in Costa Rica next week, and the meeting of the economic ministers in Bogota in September of this year, that there will come a better feeling, a better spirit; and that there will come to the fore the expressions of men like Juscelino Kubitschek, of Brazil, Pedro Beltran, of Peru, and men of the order of Figueres, of Costa Rica, and others up and down the length of this hemisphere, because they can make great contributions, if they will. What we ought to do is not be always up in the forefront, but line up side by side with our Latin American friends, so we can go forward in the same way and share equally in the objectives desired.

Mr. AIKEN. What the Senator from Montana says is absolutely true. I believe that the situation in the American states is better than it was, for the reason that we now realize we have problems. They have been brought home to us the hard way, perhaps, but we realize now we have problems. I am sure the wheels are already in motion toward creating a better atmosphere and better conditions all the way from Cape Horn to the Arctic Circle and beyond, as far as there is civilization.

I wish to say that the Senator from Montana has been definitely instrumental in getting the movement under way. Many Members of the Congress have come to realize the situation. I think many members of the press have come to realize more fully the importance of our relationships with other countries of the Western Hemisphere, because these representatives have been covering affairs of Latin America and of South America better in recent months than I have even known them to do before.

I am sure the officers of the executive branch are also cognizant of the situation, and that through cooperation of the executive and legislative branches we can move forward from the present situation.

We have the snowball started. Perhaps I should not refer to snowballs with respect to the tropics, but I have seen a lot of snow not far from the equator, though it was a couple of miles up in the air.

The program is started. Perhaps through the Cuban situation we have been brought to realize what we face. Perhaps we did not wish to realize it before, but we realize it now. I look forward to a vast improvement in the economies, in the social levels, and in the political security, of the countries of the Western Hemisphere. I wish to give to the Senator from Montana full credit for the part he has played.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Again I thank the Senator. I would state the wish that the administration would take the Senator from Vermont more into its counsels, and that as a result we might have a far better policy toward Latin America in general. Perhaps we shall have it now.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Senator from Montana has brought what I would call policy order out of what for many months and years has been policy chaos in Latin American-United States relationships.

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN] said only a few moments ago that possibly as a result of the difficulties in our relationships with Cuba we have taken a renewed interest in the relationships between the United States and our Latin American neighbors. I believe this to be true, but it required the synthesis of thought and the penetrating analysis of a man such as the Senator from Montana, in the splendid address he has given today, to bring some perspective and some sense of order to our thinking.

I thank the Senator from Montana. I read his speech, in the prepared text. I heard a sizable portion of the speech as the Senator delivered it.

Not only has the speech laid before us a program, but also it has placed before us a philosophy.

I believe what is more needed today in our foreign policy than anything else is a change of emphasis, a better philosophical undergirding—a philosophical base and foundation of cooperation, rather than of dictation or domination.

The Senator from Montana has pointed out to us how important it is that we stand side by side with our neighbors in a cooperative effort, rather than to project ourselves to the forefront. The Senator has reminded us again of the instrumentalities which are available, such as the Organization of American States, and of its potentiality for effective action in these very serious situations which now face us not only in Cuba but also, I regret to say, in many other areas of Latin America.

Mr. President, I wish to express one final thought. It seems to me that out of all these many difficulties we shall learn, if we are willing to learn. Mr. Castro has in a sense shocked the American people into a study, into at least a thoughtful consideration of what is going on in the Latin American areas. It is not that the Cuban situation is to be interpreted as symbolic of the entire Latin American region, but Mr. Castro is in the minds of the American people. In my visits around the country I have had more questions about our relationships with Cuba and more questions about Mr. Castro than I have had about any other figure on the international scene. The American people are concerned and worried, and justly so.

Secondly, we have the threat of the Soviet Union and of Mr. Khrushchev in particular, with his emotional outburst about missiles and rockets being used in case of any intervention by the United States in Cuba. This, again, has reminded us of the importance of the Monroe Doctrine and what it stands for; but also, more significantly, of the true meaning of the Rio Pact and the Organization of American States.

Out of all the travail and out of all our pain and suffering has come a new brotherhood, a new appreciation of the importance of cooperation.

I thank the Senator from Montana for his restraint. I hope every American—every thoughtful citizen—will read what the Senator from Montana has said. The Senator has not placed the blame upon the peoples of Latin America. He has spoken in a spirit of tolerance, of understanding, of wisdom, and of statesmanship. There has been no demagogery, no invective, no appeal to irrationality or to emotion. Instead, there has been an appeal for self-examination on our part, an appeal for cooperation between ourselves and our neighbors.

I am confident the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations will act with dispatch upon the resolution submitted by the Senator from Montana. I have reason to believe the chairman of the committee, because of his mature wisdom and good judgment, will call the committee into session so that we can act. I am hopeful the guidelines laid down in the resolution will be accepted in the spirit in which they are offered; not to chastise, not to place blame, not to criticize, but rather to set patterns of future conduct for this administration and for the succeeding administration.

I salute the Senator from Montana. He is always an inspiration to me.

Today the Senate, on this first day of the opening of the delayed part of the session, has witnessed statesmanship, leadership, vision, and constructive policymaking. For this we are indebted to the Senator from Montana, who, I am proud to say, is the whip of the Democratic majority. More important than that, the Senator from Montana is one of the outstanding Members of this body and is without a doubt one of the truly wise and great men of the Senate in the field of foreign policy. We are fortunate to have him. I thank the Senator.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I thank the Senator from Minnesota very much, and I assure the Senator I deeply appreciate his kind words.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. COOPER. As a member of the minority party, I wish to join in supporting the very fine speech the Senator from Montana has made.

We are greatly concerned about the situation in Cuba. But we will be shortsighted if our concern with the problem diverts us from taking constructive steps to strengthen the relations and solidarity of the American States.

I agree with a great deal the Senator has proposed in the resolution. I hope that it will come before the Senate.

In the first part of his speech, the Senator from Montana seemed to express some doubt about the recommendation of the President that $600 million be authorized to further the economic progress in Latin America. It seems to me that the recommendation made by the President, while not detailed, marks the beginning of the program proposed by the Senator. In fact, such a program was announced by the President several weeks ago.

I believe I know the concern of the Senator from Montana. He is worried that the President's recommendation may contemplate a unilateral arrangement. I do not believe the Senator should be concerned. As I say, without knowing any more details about the subject than I have read in the President's message, it seems clear, that his recommendation calls for a program to be initiated by the South American countries. A plan involving all South American countries and our own country is to be developed in which all countries can take part upon a basis of equality. If the Congress would authorize the sum stated of $600 million or a part of that sum, it would be in earnest of our intention to join in a multilateral plan, and not a unilateral plan—a multilateral plan which would have great strength and effect. I hope the Senator will consider this point, and I am sure he will not at first impression oppose the proposal of the President.

Our oldest and best friends are the countries of the Western Hemisphere. There is great affection and friendship in the Congress and in the United States for the people of Latin America. We need to strengthen our bonds of friendship, equality, and solidarity. The President's proposal and the Senator from Montana's resolution are in accord.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I am encouraged by what the Senator from Kentucky has said. He put his finger on the fear I had as to the kind of program which might well be developed. However, on the basis of what he had to say, I am assured that the administration will give full thought to the Senator's remarks, and I think very likely will look with more favor on the idea of a multilateral program, which I think would be in the best interests of all of us. I know the Senator from Kentucky agrees with me.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. I should like to join my colleague from Kentucky. I had in mind making the same point. I should like to point out to my colleague that the Marshall plan started in Europe in very much the same way. Secretary Marshall, under a Democratic President, said that the time had come to aid through self-help and actual cooperation, our European allies, who were heavily damaged by war and threatened by communism. They took up that invitation and the program was, I think, remarkably successful.

I should like to join my colleague from Kentucky in expressing his interpretation of the administration's proposal that was made this morning that this is what we have in mind with respect to our work with the Organization of American States.

I should like also to congratulate the Senator from Kentucky, with whom I have had a very long standing association in the field of foreign affairs—we both served on the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House together—in his perceptiveness and understanding that now what we do in the other American Republics must be done together with the other American States as full and equal partners in a joint endeavor.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I wish to thank the distinguished Senator from New York, with whom I have served for almost two decades in the Congress of the United States, a man who I think has an extraordinary mind, great capabilities, and a keen sense of understanding.

I hope that something will be done along the lines of what the Senator has suggested, and I hope most especially that real attention will be given to the plan advanced by President Kubitschek of Brazil almost 2 years ago, the plan known as Operation Pan-America, which would have great possibilities for all the countries of the Western Hemisphere, which would indicate that other people besides ourselves can come up with good, sound, and worthwhile ideas, and which I think would bring about some shift in the burden of leadership from the northern part of the hemisphere to the southern part. I think such an approach would be a good thing because no country has all the leadership, no country has all the brains, no country has all the know-how.

Under the aegis of such a plan as Operation Pan-America I think we can bring the Americas together and bring about a feeling and an actuality of integration in as many fields as possible. Then I think the future of the Americas will be a happy one indeed, and the recognition which is the due of every country will be assured. I thank the Senator from New York.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield.

Mr. CHURCH. I wish to join with Senators in expressing my congratulations to the distinguished Senator from Montana for a landmark address. I think that it is one which measures up to the highest standards of statesmanship of the Senate. He has advocated a program of a magnitude and character that is comparable to the combined Marshall plan and NATO alliance in Western Europe following the war, and he has introduced a resolution that could open the way for its establishment.

I merely wish to express the hope that his resolution is favorably considered by the Foreign Relations Committee, on which we both serve, and by the Senate; and that it is enacted in such form as to open the way for the initiation of such a program, a good-neighborhood policy for all the Americas. I only add the personal hope that some day we might come to call such a program the Mansfield plan.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I wish to thank my good neighbor, my good friend, and my distinguished colleague from Idaho for his kind remarks, but I think if there is going to be any plan, the best name would be Operation Pan-America.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. RANDOLPH. It has been a rewarding privilege to listen to the address of the Senator from Montana. I have been intensely interested not only in the content of the speech, but also the text of the resolution presented for the consideration of the Members of this body. The matter should have, of course, the active study of the Committee on Foreign Relations. I weigh my words when I indicate that once again the majority whip has indicated the intelligent manner in which he approaches international problems. As I have listened to him, there has come the realization anew that there is a leadership which must be evidenced within the Congress to a more marked degree in this problem and challenge than we have had in past months. Yes; I say, advisedly, in past years.

My thinking is divorced from any political consideration or any partisanship approach. The Senator from Montana did that well in his carefully couched remarks. I hope, and I believe, that this leadership can be one in which we will be joined with other peoples and other countries searching not Utopia, but a good time when we learn to live together in a world of good neighbors.

Mr. President, the issue is sharpened in Cuba and in the Latin American countries. I have been informed as a reader of the New York Times by a series of four articles by a correspondent, Tad Szulc, for that newspaper who studied conditions for 4 months on that chaotic island. He gives us a clear understanding of a very real conflict in ideology and apparent dictatorship now overwhelming the people of Cuba. It reaches out to the Latin American countries. Their people, I believe, want, insofar as possible, to work for mutual respect and understanding with the United States of America and the citizens of this Republic.

The Times correspondent reminded us that in a recent television address, Premier Castro declared "the whole world is turning against you." We must reverse such a trend—if it exists—even in part.

Certainly the resolution offered by our colleague from Montana comes in good conscience and with an appreciation that we must foster in America the rightful leadership—not a possessive leadership—along the realistic road in a necessary quest for a just peace.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I thank the Senator.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I believe the fourth of this series, as published in the New York Times, is so important that I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Aug. 4, 1960]

CUBA SHARPENING U.S. DISPUTE IN DRIVE FOR LATIN LEADERSHIP

(By Tad Szulc)

The Cuban Government, which is trying to spread the influence of its revolution throughout Latin America and to turn the Latin countries against the United States, does not seem interested in reaching an accommodation with Washington.

Despite the frequent protestations of the government of Premier Fidel Castro that it is a victim of U.S. "imperialism" and that it is eager to negotiate all differences "on an equal footing," most diplomats in Havana believe that Cuba prefers to maintain, and even to sharpen, the present tension.

The violence and the bitterness of the anti-United States campaign carried on by Cuba at home and wherever possible in the rest of Latin America do not provide a climate in which any negotiations could be fruitful.

Months before the United States cut the Cuban sugar quota, this campaign adopted as its principal slogan the cry of "Cuba yes, Yankees no!" This cry echoes throughout Cuba in the speeches of the regime's top officials, at the anti-United States rallies being held with increasing frequency, in official newspapers and on radio and television programs.

Insults have been heaped on President Eisenhower, Secretary of State Christian A. Herter and other U.S. officials, and the attacks seem to gain in intensity every day.

In a calculated act of defiance, the Castro regime has allied itself closely with the Communist bloc, thus bringing Soviet influence to within 90 miles of the United States.

This system of political and economic alliances was highlighted early in July by Premier Khrushchev's offer to send Soviet missiles against the United States should Cuba ever be attacked by the "Yankees."

Despite the Soviet involvement in the Caribbean, and despite all the hostile acts in the economic and political field, the United States appears powerless for the time being to solve the Castro problem.

PROBLEM TERMED "INSOLUBLE"

A Western European diplomat in Havana commented recently that "this little island has created one of the most insoluble foreign policy problems that the United States has had to face" since World War II.

In the meantime, the possibility that Premier Castro will be removed from leadership for an indefinite period during his recuperation from the pneumonia attack he suffered last month could deeply affect the entire Cuban picture, domestically and internationally.

Despite the steadily increasing influence of radical elements such as his brother Maj. Raul Castro and Maj. Ernesto Guevara, the Premier remains the greatest symbol of the revolution.

Because of their personal allegiance to the Premier, millions of Cubans stand steadfastly behind the revolution, even if some of its most recent aspects disturb them.

LOYALTIES COULD BE ALTERED

However, if Major Castro, who is Armed Forces Minister, succeeds his brother as Premier even temporarily, as is expected, the whole structure of revolutionary loyalties could be thrown out of balance.

This could be particularly true if the Premier was absent for a long time and if Major Castro and Major Guevara sought to take advantage of their power to implant still deeper their extreme leftwing policies.

Major Guevara, who directs the economy as president of the national bank, would probably work closely with Major Castro if the latter became Acting Premier.

Notwithstanding great efforts in recent months to build sympathetic images of the two majors, their personal popularity is limited. They are resented even by some of Premier Castro's closest friends and collaborators, especially since they began moving their own followers into more and more of the regime's key positions.

OPPOSITION MIGHT GROW

A situation whereby Premier Castro would be forced to stand aside for a prolonged period would undoubtedly be exploited by foes of the Government, who have been working hard to organize an opposition movement. The recrudescence of such opposition activities could bring greater repression by the regime, serving to increase domestic tensions.

In the international field, Cuba's position may harden at the conference of American foreign ministers that will deal with the Cuba-United States dispute and with Soviet interference in Latin America, if Major Castro and Major Guevara are in control of the regime.

The key to the whole situation is the length of time that Premier Castro might be away from his post.

It is taken for granted that Premier Castro's brother will succeed him if he must be absent. The Premier made this clear some time ago. Major Guevara has not been mentioned in the line of succession, but today his power is so great he cannot be ignored in a reshuffle of the top leadership. An unknown quantity is President Osvaldo Dorticós Torrado, who in recent months has been playing an increasingly important role, seemingly favoring radical trends in the regime.

AFFECTS LATIN COUNTRIES

The Cuban situation is intimately tied to the situation in all Latin America. It affects each of the individual governments as well as the position of the United States in the Western Hemisphere.

In the 19 months of its existence, the Castro regime has worked hard to build up an image of the United States as the enemy of social justice, progress, and Latin America's emancipation from the "imperialist yoke."

Because of the natural sympathies of large segments of Latin American populations are directed toward the concept of the Cuban social revolution and the personality of Premier Castro, this image has found sufficient acceptance to prevent most of the hemisphere's governments from siding openly with the United States in a dispute with Cuba.

Privately, these governments deplore the behavior of the Castro regime and are alarmed by the entry of the Soviet Union into the hemisphere and by the increasing Communist influence in Havana. Since most of them represent moderate, middle-of-the-road groups, which believe in evolution instead of revolution as a means of solving their countries' problems, they also fear the contagion of the revolutionary ideas emanating from Havana.

LATIN LEADERS CRITICIZED

In its drive for the political leadership of Latin America against the United States, the Castro regime has openly classified most of the hemisphere's rulers as its enemies and as the enemies of their people.

President Romulo Betancourt of Venezuela, President Alberto Lleras Camargo of Colombia, President Jorge Alessandri Rodriguez of Chile, and Premier Pedro G. Beltrán of Peru are the favorite targets of the official Cuban propaganda.

Posters on government buildings in Havana describe Cuba as the "Free territory of the Americas," in a clear allusion to the often repeated statements by Dr. Castro and his top aides that the day of Latin America's "liberation" is approaching.

Last May, President Dorticós toured Latin America on an expedition specifically designed to gain support against the United States. Some of his statements about the United States were so completely removed from reality that the Department of State sent Cuba a special note of protest.

On July 26, the anniversary of Dr. Castro's revolutionary movement, an extreme left-wing Congress of Latin American youth opened in Cuba. The congress' purpose was to discuss plans to oust all U.S. influence from Latin America.

On the same day, Dr. Castro urged in a fiery speech that the Andes become "the Sierra Maestra of the Americas." It was from the Sierra Maestra that the Castro rebels conducted their guerrilla warfare against the regime of Gen. Fulgencio Batista.

Earlier this year, Major Guevara published in his book, "War of Guerrillas," a detailed blueprint for rebel operations that he wrote, could be carried out "in our America."

At present, Cuban leaders are in secret negotiations with a group of leaders of Peronist forces in Argentina—followers of the ousted dictator Juan D. Perón—aiming at a pact for joint operations. President Arturo Frondizi of Argentina could become the first target of such operations.

While Dr. Castro apparently does not intend to go back on his Soviet alliances, his representatives hope to set at rest the concern of Latin American governments on this subject when the hemisphere foreign ministers convene August 16 in San José, Costa Rica.

Such is the sensitivity of Latin Americans on the Cuban question that Cuba was not directly mentioned in Peru's request for the ministers' conference. The proposal spoke only of extracontinental activities in the area.

PUERTO RICAN REVOLT PUSHED

Cuban propaganda, distributed by the Government-operated Prensa Latina news service, by Cuban embassies in Latin-American capitals and by radio programs beamed at other Latin countries from powerful transmitters in Havana, concentrates on the denigration of the United States and urges the liberation of our sister republics.

Cuban propaganda materials have been seized repeatedly by authorities in other countries. Cuban agents have been arrested and Cuban diplomats expelled for engaging in subversive activities.

Cuba has been encouraging Puerto Rican nationalists to fight for independence from the United States by any available means. It has even gone to the extreme of dispatching propaganda materials to the Deep South of the United States to incite the Negro populations against the Federal Government.

The pattern of Cuban activities in Latin America has suggested to diplomats that the Castro regime finds it infinitely more attractive to keep up its feud with the United States than to try to settle it.

This trend has also suggested to a number of friendly diplomats that the United States should abandon temporarily all the efforts to force a direct solution of the Castro problem and concentrate instead on recouping its positions in the rest of Latin America.

They say that if the United States can convince Latin America of its sincere desire to help solve that area's basic social and economic problems, the Castro influence will proportionately decrease and the Cuban problem may eventually finds its own solution.

UNITED STATES GRANTED LOAN TO PERU

A step was taken in that direction July 28, when the United States announced the grant to Peru of a $53,200,000 loan for land and farm equipment.

It was the first time that the United States had agreed to a major aid program with deep social implications. In the past, U.S. assistance concentrated on industrial and related projects, although there were some minor social undertakings, and on straight financial loans to aid sagging economies.

The loan to Peru followed a much smaller one to the same country earmarked for housing. That, too, was a departure from past policies. Much of the credit for achieving a change in the United States thinking on these matters is given to the patient eloquence of Premier Beltrán.

The Peruvian projects may represent the beginning of the new assistance program announced by President Eisenhower July 11, which may call for an initial outlay of $500 million.

While Latin Americans were pleased with this evidence of U.S. interest in their problems, many of them took some pleasure in recalling that the new socially oriented approach to hemisphere problems was proposed by Brazil's President, Dr. Juscelino Kubitschek, 2 years ago. Only the urgency of the Cuban crisis, they stressed, led the United States to begin taking the Kubitschek suggestions seriously, after first dismissing them as unfeasible in the immediate future.

NEW PRESIDENT AWAITED

Latin Americans are, however, resigned to the fact that any major new program must await the inauguration of a new administration in the United States.

Many of those who are friendly to the United States think that the new administration will have perhaps the last chance to repair the deteriorating Latin American relationships and set them on a new road.

Faithful to their traditional sympathy for Democrats in the United States, most Latin Americans are hoping for the election of Senator JOHN F. KENNEDY as President. A question often asked in Havana is: "Do you think that the relations between Cuba and the United States will improve if the Democrats win?"

Aside from Communist and leftwing groups of workers and students vociferously supporting Dr. Castro in Latin America, many Latin Americans refuse to share the United States preoccupation with communism in Cuba. They often agree that this is just another case of Washington's using the specter of communism to protect its economic interests.

While many Latin Americans recognize that Cuba was at fault in seizing and confiscating U.S. property without offering reasonable compensation, they also took a critical view of President Eisenhower's drastic cutting of the Cuban sugar quota.

There would have been few objections if the United States had simply refused to go on paying its 2-cent premium above the world price on quota sugar, but the outright cut of the quota appeared to many Latin Americans as a naked attempt to force the overthrow of Premier Castro through economic sanctions.

While the Castro regime appears to be carrying out its anti-United States campaign for political gain, its motives also include real fears and grievances and even a historical concept.

Premier Castro is convinced that the United States will begin, or assist, an attack on Cuba, as he says was the case in Guatemala when President Jacobo Arbenz Guzman, a man of the extreme left, was in power there in 1954.

He has said repeatedly that Washington intends to turn Cuba into "another Guatemala" or into "another Spain."

While this fear is genuine to a large extent, the alleged threat of "aggression" has also proved to be a first-rate instrument for keeping the revolutionary spirit alive. It is an excuse for proceeding with the "hate America" campaign, for building up military strength through militias, which have become a virtual people's army alongside the regular military establishment, and for attracting the sympathies of Latin American lands and other countries.

In fact, an "aggression" complex has developed in Cuba, and every act or word in the United States that is thought to be critical of the revolutionary regime is immediately presented in the official newspapers as a "new aggression."

In support of this aggression theory, the Government continually reminds Cubans and foreigners that the top officials of the ousted regime of General Batista, classified in Cuba as "war criminals," are harbored in the United States and are allowed to conspire freely.

When occasional light planes escaped the vigilance of the U.S. authorities last year and early this year to make forays over Cuba, the regime's propaganda spoke of "daily bombing raids." Although these flights are now being prevented, no credit has been given to the United States.

One of the principal grievances of the Castro regime is that few words of protest were heard from the United States while the Batista government committed atrocities against the opposition but there was an immediate outcry when more than 500 "war criminals" were executed early last year.

Behind the Cuban revolutionary attitude toward the United States is the belief, held firmly by Premier Castro and his companions, that the United States has entered into a period of decadence and that the future of the world is about to enter the hands of young revolutionaries everywhere.

In May, Revolución, the regime's semi-official newspaper, published a special 40-page supplement dedicated to this theory of U.S. decadence. Another 80-page supplement in July dealt with racial problems in the United States.

And in a recent television speech, Dr. Castro addressed himself with cold contempt to the United States.

"The whole world is turning against you," he said.

The attitudes of both sides have set off so much bitterness that any immediate reconciliation, even if Cuba desired it, seems to be ruled out.

BITTER NOTES EXCHANGED

The relations between the two countries have become confined to economic reprisals and counterreprisals, to the harassment of each other's citizens and to the exchange of bitter diplomatic notes. Recently, the Cubans have adopted the method of simply rejecting U.S. notes.

With the original U.S. policy of patience and tolerance finally abandoned and the new policy of toughness not offering clear-cut possibilities of a follow-up, relations seem destined to remain for a long time on this bitter and sterile level.

On the human level, the regime's anti-American campaign has not produced any pronounced sentiment against individual Americans in Cuba, although some incidents have occurred. The dominant feeling is of regret and bewilderment that relations should have deteriorated so badly.

Perhaps illustrative of the attitude of Cubans who are devoted followers of Dr. Castro was a penciled declaration in English ceremoniously handed to a U.S. newsman by a group of militia members at a refinery, belonging to a U.S. oil company, that was recently seized by the Government. It read:

"I am a Cuban worker. After my 8 hours of daily work, I do 6 hours of guard for Cuba and the Revolution. We don't have nothing against American people, only with the monopolies and who back them, the Government. I have a brother in the United States of America. He is an American citizen. He fought in the last war. He continue being my brother. All the American citizens are welcome to Cuba, free territory of America."

Mr. LONG of Hawaii. Mr. President, I wish to join the distinguished Senators who have spoken in behalf of the quality and the spirit of the wonderful address which has been made by the junior Senator from Montana.

For a long period of time I have followed statements the Senator has made on the floor of the Senate and also articles published in magazines of opinion in the Nation on foreign policy.

The address today represents a great step forward. One point in it leads me to refer to it briefly. In the summary, near the end, the Senator advocated the establishment, perhaps at the University of Puerto Rico, of a study center to bring together students from all the nations of North America and South America.

We must cooperate with our neighbors to the south, economically. We must cooperate with them in meeting our responsibilities in relation to defense. In neither of these fields will we find a solution to the problem that is before us. It will come only from education and through understanding. That involves not toleration, but real appreciation. In the cultures of these nations there is a basis for that understanding and appreciation.

We have already, in the Senate, during the past year, set an example for that, when we added to the Mutual Security Act provisions for the establishment in Hawaii of the East-West Cultural and Scientific Institute, which I believe offers a very great potential. I commend the Senator.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I thank the Senator from Hawaii. As he was speaking I, too, was thinking of the East-West Institute, which he helped so much to get underway. I believe that the University of the Americas, if it comes into being, should be called the North-South Institute.

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield.

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. President, I desire to compliment my distinguished friend, the great junior Senator from Montana, on an excellent address this afternoon. I was necessarily absent from the floor during the time he made the address, but I took the time before leaving the floor to read his speech.

I have always observed that when the Senator from Montana speaks on a subject, he not only speaks with great clarity, but also speaks in a constructive manner. The speech he has made today on Latin America is no exception. It is a speech in which he not only outlines the problems, but also deals specifically with the areas involved. In addition, the speech lays down constructive proposals which he would make with respect to the handling of those problems.

It is one thing to criticize or to say that what we are doing is not adequate or not right, but it is another thing to come forward with a constructive and substantial program which suggests a solution to the problems that confront us. In every case when the junior Senator from Montana has spoken, he has taken precisely the latter attitude.

I observe that in this instance he is opposed to a direct loan program. He feels that it goes in old paths and that we ought to seek new methods to solve the very difficult problems that confront us in Cuba and elsewhere with other Latin American countries, where we have, as he has stated in his speech, neglected our efforts over a period of years.

So again, as I did with reference to his speech on the Far East, I compliment the Senator from Montana on the great speech, a fine and constructive statement, in the field of foreign policy, as he always does. I join again, as I have done in the past, other Senators in complimenting him upon the kind of effort he has made, which is bipartisan in character, objective in character, and constructive, and which adds to the solution of the problems America faces today throughout the world.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I thank the Senator.

CIVIL RIGHTS LEGISLATION

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, my purpose in taking the floor today is based upon my deep feeling that immediately upon the opening of this rather brief session, the position of people like myself—who have already had occasion earlier in the day to test the climate here about civil rights—should be made very clear upon this issue.

If this were an issue which had not been sharpened and brought most forcibly before the whole country in both political conventions, and in the tremendous public attention and discussion which have taken place up to now by virtue of those conventions, and the convictions of the respective candidates upon this subject, someone might complain about raising it. But if it were not raised, we would be living in a dream world, as sometimes we think we are living in a dream world in the Senate.

Mr. President, we do not live in a dream world. I do not believe many others do, either. I am not dissuaded or alarmed by charges of "politics." Whatever individual Members do here will soon enough result in showing what the people ought to think about them with respect to this particular issue.

I believe it very important, in all honesty and fairness to the American people, to make clear our purposes and our intentions. I should like to make mine very plain.

Later this week I shall introduce, in the form of a bill, the platform of my party on civil rights. At the same time I hope—although I have no idea whether I shall be successful—that the bill which I shall introduce will not only have other Members of my party as sponsors of it—but also may have sponsors among Senators who are Democrats.

In turn, I should like to offer, although I know that my colleague from New York [Mr. KEATING] will introduce the Democratic Party platform—I should like to offer to Senators on the Democratic side—and I worked before with all who are interested in civil rights—cosponsorship, if any Senators should desire it, of a bill on what is contained in the Democratic platform.

In short, I think it would be highly desirable to continue the bipartisan attitude which has always permeated civil rights and to introduce both what is contained in the Democratic platform and the Republican platform in legislative form—and they certainly are not in legislative form in those platforms—in the Senate with bipartisan sponsorship. That, I believe would be a signal service.

I point out that even the Washington Post, which was rather critical in other respects of what I had proposed about introducing the program of my party in legislative form, nevertheless said:

> Senator JAVITS' proposal of an omnibus civil rights bill to carry out the pledges in the Republican platform has the ostensible virtue of putting these pledges in legislative form.

The Post went on to point out:

> But the net effect can only be mischievous.

I shall deal with that statement in a minute. On the other hand, the New York Post, a distinguished newspaper published in New York City, said the following about this matter:

> JAVITS is not simply proposing a partisan formula for embarrassing the Democrats with a futile gesture. He is presenting a challenge to the leaders and candidates of both parties.

I am very proud to say that the New York Times, in an editorial published last Tuesday, approves of the course I am proposing to take.

Why is this course, in my opinion, the right one? First and foremost, I have already said that I shall put in legislative form what are inchoate pledges. This is always a great benefit to Congress. That is certainly something upon which we can all agree, namely, that the pledges of the parties shall be put in a form for enactment into legislation, so that any part of them which we like, we can take, and they are ready made to be passed as a bill, whether now or in the new Congress.

I ask unanimous consent that this editorial may be printed at this point in my remarks.

Without objection, it was so ordered.

CIVIL RIGHTS IN THE SENATE

Senator JACOB K. JAVITS, of New York, is, as everyone knows, a Republican, and we suppose that neither he nor the Senators on the other side of the aisle can be entirely nonpartisan this summer. Nevertheless it is interesting to see that Senator JAVITS, announcing that he would introduce a bill covering the main points of the Republican civil rights plank when the Senate reconvenes on August 8, said that he would try to get a Democratic Senator to go along with him, to "demonstrate the spirit of bipartisan cooperation which must exist * * * if meaningful civil rights bills are to pass the Senate."

Senator JAVITS laid down some principal points covering: School attendance as evidence of literacy; authorizing the Attorney General to sue on behalf of individuals denied the right to attend a nonsegregated public school; the establishment of a Federal Commission on Equal Job Opportunity, and Federal aid to public schools attempting to carry out desegregation orders. Mr. JAVITS would also go along with what should be a bipartisan proposal to make it harder to filibuster on the Senate floor against civil rights legislation.

What happens next will be interesting to watch. Certainly both parties are now committed to stronger guarantees of civil rights than they were before the conventions met. And it will be difficult for either party under the circumstances to obstruct new civil rights legislation, short though the time may be.

Mr. JAVITS. The other thing which we believe is this. I urge Senators to mark me on this, because it is very important. We point out that what is the roadblock to action in this field constantly is the filibuster—the filibuster threatened or actual.

When the majority leader—and I feel he is entirely in good faith—I shall be the first to say it—in everything he said today about his own platform, however he may have voted before—and there will be lots of argument about that—but I really think he means it when he says he speaks of what the Democrats have promised now, but he himself had to put a price on the head of civil rights legislation by saying, "If you press this, you will kill everything else." Why would it kill everything else? Because rule XXII stands there, and because a small minority in the Senate has that power, unless we deprive them of it on cloture by a vote of two-thirds of the Senators present and voting. It gives them power to block everything else. It is a power which they do not hesitate to use; a power which they used before even in committee action, as chairmen of committees, quite apart from debate on the floor. It gives them power to kill everything else unless we follow what they want in respect to civil rights.

The second thing, therefore, which introducing these bills, with bipartisan sponsorship to make a stand for them here, will do is to focus the attention of the country on what is blocking action I believe to be in the national interest on civil rights, and that is rule XXII as now written. Not in February or March, next, but in January, the day the Senate gets here, we will have an opportunity to do something about rule XXII, as we did in 1959, when we adopted a miniscule change, a change which I think caused us to fall far short of our responsibility in civil rights, as we saw when the civil rights bill was under debate in the Senate this year.

Unless a head of steam is put behind the proposal to change rule XXII now, I assure Senators that nothing much is likely to happen next January. That is point No. 2.

Point No. 3: We cannot avert our eyes from the fact that civil rights is no longer an issue of the domestic tranquillity of the United States. This is an issue of a most massive international kind. It is an issue very intimately affecting the peace leadership of our country and our country's stand in the world.

If we need any proof, it is found in the unbelievable problem of the 600 million Chinese whose skin is yellow; and in the almost equally unbelievable problem of the whole continent of Africa, whose people have black skins, and who are in a ferment today.

Anyone who can pretend that the civil rights issue today is what it was even 2 years ago, or 3 years ago, let alone 10 or 20 years ago, has not kept abreast of the march of history. No longer is civil rights a matter of domestic interest and of the actions in particular States of the Union. Civil rights has now become a major issue of the foreign policy of the United States and of the leadership and prestige of the United States. Therefore, I think it is right to rank it with the prime issues before our country.

The majority leader, when I was questioning him a while ago, implied that this was my one particular interest, my primary interest.

I think I know a little about—although I do not know all I should like—foreign economic policy; also the United Nations and the federations and alliances with which the United States is concerned. My interest also is in civil liberties and in a host of other matters including constitutional and international law. But I will state with pride that civil rights is certainly one of the main issues with which I am concerned. Because, for the reasons I have just stated, civil rights has become an enormous foreign policy issue in addition to a great constitutional issue.

So we now have three reasons why what is being done should be done. First, and very importantly, is the fact that it puts the proposals in legislative form. Second, and very importantly, we focus attention upon the urgent need for a change in rule XXII.

Third, and very importantly, because this is one of the towering issues of our time; and even if we would like to wait, the times will not wait.

Fourth, and very importantly, we have this situation. It is a fact that a number of the items which are contained in the civil rights proposals have been thoroughly debated and thoroughly reviewed. They have been thoroughly considered. They were urgently needed but were omitted from the civil rights package which was passed earlier this year only because of the threat of a filibuster and the need, therefore, to trim down the package so that it would be acceptable. At least, it was felt that the certain Senators who were against civil rights might not vote for it, but they might not think it was worth filibustering in order to kill the bill altogether.

Since that time, there have been two great conclaves of the political parties. In those two great national conclaves of the parties, civil rights was perhaps the primary issue—certainly, one of a very few primary issues. In both instances, the conventions came forth with declarations supporting, not the position which succeeded in Congress, but supporting the position which failed here. We can then not fail, in considering a legislative program during the continuation of the previous session of Congress, at least to raise the issue, when we have the opportunity of at least repairing what we should have done, but did not do. This part which was already up in 1960 has all been thoroughly debated and thoroughly reviewed by whatever factual data and testimony there needed to be taken on the subject earlier in the session; therefore it can be acted on, now.

I think it would be unrealistic to suppose that this cannot and should not be done.

As to the charges of partisanship, I think it will prove to be the case, very possibly and unhappily, that we will have considerable defections on this side of the aisle, too, when it comes to a cloture motion or comes to having civil rights tests, just as there are bound to be defections on the other side of the aisle even in addition to the built-in opposition of certain Democratic Senators traditionally opposed to civil rights laws.

The way to take partisanship out of civil rights is to do something about it. The way to inject partisanship into civil rights is to do nothing or to beg the question.

The Senate is comprised of 100 Members. Only 22 Senators come from Southern States. If our platforms mean what they say, we can, without any unfairness, on at least two items which the President asks for and which have been thoroughly considered and debated in this body, vote cloture in an afternoon. If we mean what we say, we can vote a civil rights bill; or we can vote for no bill or put a price on the head of a civil rights bill.

We are faced with an enormous international issue, an issue which has taken up an enormous amount of time, and which has focused attention in both national conventions. We are in a position to do something about it without any unfairness and without adventuring into new ground. We can deal now at least with matters which have been established, debated, and thoroughly considered.

I think at the very least Senators should try to do something about it.

I notice that the Senator from South Carolina is about to leave the Chamber. I would not wish to deprive him of his opportunity to question me.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I simply wish to ask whether the Senator from New York has any bills or resolutions which he will seek to introduce today and ask that they not be referred to committees.

Mr. JAVITS. I shall introduce a bill later in the week to implement the platform planks adopted by my party in Chicago. Whether I shall seek to prevent that bill from being referred to committee or seek to have it placed on the calendar directly is something about which I shall wish to consult with my colleagues on this side of the aisle, who I hope, will be parties to the bill. But I will put into precise legislative form, and will state right now, at least in detail, as part of my speech, the particular provisions which will be contained in that bill.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. But without submitting today any proposed amendment of the rules, or anything of that sort, in connection with proposed civil rights legislation?

Mr. JAVITS. No. I am not introducing the measure today; that is correct.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Very well. I did not wish to leave the floor, and then find, later, that something of that sort had happened. [Laughter.]

Mr. JAVITS. The Senator may safely leave the floor, if that is his concern. But I assure him that something will happen, and I hope it will happen very soon.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I shall certainly be here when it does. [Laughter.]

Mr. JAVITS. Certainly.

Mr. President, the provisions which will be included in the measure I shall introduce are the following:

First. Further safeguard the voting right by declaring that in all Federal elections, proof of completion of six primary grades in a State accredited school constitutes proof of literacy for voting purposes.

Second. Authorization for the U.S. Attorney General to bring civil actions on behalf of individuals who charge denial of constitutionally guaranteed rights, including the right to attend a nonsegregated public school.

Third. Enactment of two proposals, originally part of the administration's civil rights bill, but omitted from the 1960 Civil Rights Act—for the establishment by law of a Federal Commission on Equal Job Opportunity to carry on and expand the work of the President's Committee on Government Contracts, and extending Federal aid and technical assistance to public schools seeking to comply with desegregation orders.

Also, Mr. President, in order to give notice of what will be impending here when we return in January, let me state that I shall introduce a resolution to change rule XXII in accordance with the so-called Douglas plan, on which I have previously collaborated with the distinguished Senator from Illinois, and which was favorably reported from the Rules Committee when I was a member of that committee, and was a prelude to the change in the rule in 1959.

Mr. President, one other point: I do not believe—and now I am stating my purposes very accurately—that the same arguments properly apply to parts of a civil-rights package which have not been considered before and have not been thoroughly debated and factually analyzed, as those which apply to the ones which previously have been considered and thoroughly debated and factually analyzed. In the former category we put, first, the proposal for a statutory basis for the Federal Commission on Equal Job Opportunity, as regards Government contractors; and, second, technical assistance through Federal aid to school districts which seek to comply with school-desegregation orders. I also believe the same argument would apply to such a limited Part III, as it is called, as would give the Attorney General authority to institute Federal suits in representative cases to bring about desegregation in public schools.

On the other hand, with respect to the literacy test, I believe the evidence should be taken, perhaps more comprehensively than could take place at a brief session of the character of the present one. I say that for the reason that the Leadership Conference on civil rights has urged that at this session we legislate on the three primary matters I have described, which certainly have been debated, discussed, and considered. I should like to express my agreement as to that; and I believe that would be the fair and honorable way to proceed with respect to civil-rights measures, and that it is a ready answer to the argument of those who say that if we begin to consider civil-rights measures, our procedure will continue ad infinitum, and will prevent us from taking action on other necessary measures. As to those three matters, I believe it would be proper to invoke cloture very promptly. I believe that would be the proper way for us to proceed.

As to the other matters in regard to civil rights, in connection with the pledges of the Republican platform and the pledges of the Democratic platform, I believe the proper way for us to proceed is to set a day certain—rather than wait until next June or July, at which time we know such a measure could not be acted on—for our consideration of proposed civil rights legislation, knowing it to deal with a vexing and demanding problem on the Federal level.

Mr. President, I think I have stated clearly the three items which can, and which should be, acted on at this session—and by invoking a cloture motion, if necessary—without interfering in any way with other legislative measures.

Second, I have stated my belief as to the propriety of the fixing of a day certain for the consideration by this body of other civil rights legislation, as called for by the platforms of both the two major parties, so such measures will be considered at the next session, by agreement with the majority leader and the minority leader, knowing full well that another Congress could upset that proposed time schedule, but also knowing that the commitment made by the two party leaders undoubtedly will be met.

Mr. President, this is the honorable way to proceed. If there is any charge of party politics in this connection, such a charge can properly be made, I feel, only by those who do not want to have any action in this field taken by the Congress.

For certainly the Congress will not be able to act without support from both sides of the aisle. When we act, we need votes by Members on the other side of the aisle just as urgently as we need votes by Members on this side of the aisle, for the Congress cannot succeed in taking action without the benefit of votes by Members on both sides of the aisle.

I conclude by saying that no matter what charge may be made against me by anyone, no matter how high his place, I pledge myself, as I have done during all the years I have been in Congress, to rational, intelligent, reasonable action on a bipartisan level as stated in these remarks—not extremist action, which is not desirable or called for in this situation.

I hope very much that in the days ahead more and more of our colleagues will rally around that standard, and that we shall make our contribution—limited though it may be—in pursuance of the pledges made by both of the two great national parties at their conventions, which succeeded, not preceded, the Civil Rights Act of 1960.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

THE ANTARCTIC TREATY

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, is the Senate in executive session?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate is in executive session.

Mr. MANSFIELD. What is the pending business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Antarctic Treaty.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Executive B, 86th Congress, 2d Session, the Antarctic Treaty, signed at Washington on December 1, 1959.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I firmly believe that the Antarctic Treaty, which was signed at Washington last December, is a genuine step forward in international relations and a positive contribution to peace.

What does this treaty accomplish?

First and foremost, it prevents the use of Antarctica for military purposes. Fortifications, military bases, and weapons are all prohibited. Complementing this provision is a far-reaching inspection provision which provides for a sweeping, unprecedented, and unilateral right of inspection which will permit U.S. observers to go anywhere in Antarctica at any time. The unilateral right of overflight for aerial observation is especially noteworthy.

Another major provision of the treaty is the elimination of controversies arising out of territorial claims asserted in Antarctica. This tangled claims question in effect is set aside by means of a provision stating that nothing in the treaty shall be interpreted as either a renunciation or recognition of claims or bases of claims to territorial sovereignty there. Although the United States has never made an official territorial claim in Antarctica, it also has never recognized any claims of other countries there. It has consistently reserved all of its rights throughout the whole of Antarctica, which are based on a long record of discovery, exploration, and other activities. The treaty is definitely not a "sellout" or "giveaway" of U.S. rights and interests in Antarctica, which we continue to maintain absolutely intact.

The implication that this treaty "invites the Soviet Union into Antarctica" is false. The Soviets have carried on a level of scientific activity in Antarctica roughly comparable to our own since early 1956, when they established a scientific station there. Since their policy, like ours, is one of not recognizing the claims of others in Antarctica, they, like us, feel free to move about in Antarctica without permission of the claimant countries. While many of us might wish that the Soviets were not present in Antarctica, the simple fact is that they are there, and apparently will be there for a long time. The only way I know of getting them out of there would be by force; I doubt if many critics of their presence there would vote for that policy.

This treaty does not grant to the Soviets or anyone else any greater right of access to Antarctica than they now have. On the contrary, it imposes certain restrictions on their activity there, which, according to the treaty, must only be of a peaceful nature. As I have said earlier, this provision is accompanied by a very sweeping and unprecedented right of inspection which is not contained in any other treaty negotiated with the Soviet Union to date. It would certainly be unfortunate if we should fail to ratify the first international agreement which provides such an unlimited right of inspection.

On the question of claims, we should remember that seven nations, all friendly to us, have asserted territorial claims in Antarctica, many of them of long standing. These nations were concerned during the negotiations that the treaty should contain nothing that might imply a weakening or renunciation of these claims. Among the claimants, Chile and Argentina—who have repeatedly and fervently pressed their claims of sovereignty there—consider that the territory they claim in Antarctica actually constitutes an extension of their national territory.

When we stop to realize that the 12 countries invited to the Conference on Antarctica last year represented all of the six continents of the world as well as widely differing national viewpoints, I believe it is a minor miracle that any treaty at all on Antarctica was signed. But it was signed, and by all of the countries which the United States invited to participate in the Conference. This in itself is a tribute to the painstaking diplomatic work that went into this treaty over a 2-year period.

In addition, the treaty provides for continued freedom of scientific investigation and international cooperation in science, which were conspicuously successful in Antarctica during the International Geophysical Year. A system is also provided for continuing consultation among governments of countries actively engaged in scientific investigation in Antarctica through periodic meetings. Nuclear explosions and disposal of radioactive waste material in Antarctica are both prohibited, pending general international agreement on this subject. This matter, incidentally, was of great concern to our friends in Southern Hemisphere countries, who insisted that this provision be included in the treaty.

This treaty was conceived by the United States. The Conference on Antarctica in Washington last fall at which the treaty was signed was the result of a U.S. invitation. The treaty contains the provisions the United States considered were required to protect its national interests in Antarctica. It does not attempt to settle all the problems of Antarctica for all time, and it does not represent the optimum that would have been preferred by any one of the participating countries, since it was necessary to accommodate the different interests of 12 nations.

In any event, I believe that this treaty represents a definite step forward in providing for peace and some form of international order in a large area of the earth's surface.

Due to the U.S. initiative in this whole matter, it is natural to assume that other contracting parties—as well as world opinion—are keeping a close watch on our attitude toward ratification. I strongly urge that the Senate ratify this very worthwhile treaty.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point a messsage from the President of the United States in regard to the Antarctic Treaty, and various addenda having to do with the same subject.

There being no objection, the message and other documents were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES TRANSMITTING A CERTIFIED COPY OF THE ANTARCTIC TREATY, SIGNED AT WASHINGTON ON DECEMBER 1, 1959, BY THE PLENIPOTENTIARIES OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA AND 11 OTHER COUNTRIES

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 15, 1960.

To the Senate of the United States:

With a view to receiving the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification, I transmit herewith a certified copy of the Antarctic Treaty, signed at Washington on December 1, 1959, by plenipotentiaries of the United States of America and 11 other countries.

This is a unique and historic treaty. It provides that a large area of the world—an area equal in size to Europe and the United States combined—will be used for peaceful purposes only. It contains a broad, unrestricted inspection system to insure that the nonmilitarization provisions will be carried out.

The purposes and provisions of the treaty are explained in the report of the Secretary of State, which is transmitted herewith.

I transmit also, for the information of the Senate, a certified copy of the final act of the Conference on Antarctica, held at Washington October 15 to December 1, 1959, at which the treaty was formulated. The final act does not require ratification.

I am gratified to recall that it was at the initiative of the United States that the Conference on Antarctica was convened. On May 2, 1958, the United States extended to the 11 other countries which participated in the Antarctic program of the International Geophysical Year an invitation to participate in a conference to consider the conclusion of a treaty on Antarctica for certain stated purposes. The invitation was accepted by all 11 countries: Argentina, Australia, Belgium, Chile, the French Republic, Japan, New Zealand, Norway, the Union of South Africa, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland.

The spirit of cooperation and mutual understanding with which representatives of the 12 countries drafted the Antarctic Treaty and signed it for their respective Governments is an inspiring example of what can be accomplished by international cooperation in the field of science and in the pursuit of peace.

I believe that the Antarctic Treaty is a significant advance toward the goal of peaceful world with justice. In the hope that the United States, which initiated the idea of the Antarctic Treaty, may be one of the first to ratify it, I recommend that the Senate give it early and favorable consideration.

DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 15, 1960.

(Enclosures: (1) Report of the Secretary of State; (2) the Antarctic Treaty (certified copy); (3) U.S. Government note of May 2, 1958; (4) final act of the Conference on Antarctica (certified copy).)

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, February 4, 1960.

THE PRESIDENT,
The White House:

I have the honor to submit to you, with a view to its transmission to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification, a certified copy of the Antarctic Treaty, signed at Washington on December 1, 1959, on behalf of the United States of America and 11 other countries. Those countries are Argentina, Australia, Belgium, Chile, the French Republic, Japan, New Zealand, Norway, the Union of South Africa, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland.

The treaty was formulated at the Conference on Antarctica held at Washington from October 15 to December 1, 1959. The idea for the conference was initiated by the Government of the United States which, on May 2, 1958, extended an invitation to take part in such a conference to the 11 other countries which participated in the Antarctic program of the International Geophysical Year. A copy of the U.S. note of invitation, dated May 2, 1958, is enclosed for transmittal to the Senate for its information.

Acceptances were received from all 11 governments, and subsequently informal preparatory talks were held in Washington among representatives of the 12 countries. When the conference convened on October 15, 1959, it used as a basis for discussion working papers considered in the course of the preparatory talks.

The treaty formulated at the conference and signed on behalf of all 12 countries incorporated the basic purposes of the U.S. proposal and provides practical means for their fulfillment.

The treaty consists of a preamble and 14 articles. It was drafted, as stated in the preamble in recognition "* * * that it is in the interest of all mankind that Antarctica shall continue forever to be used exclusively for peaceful purposes and shall not become the scene or object of international discord."

The preamble also makes clear that the treaty is designed to further the purposes and principles embodied in the Charter of the United Nations.

Article I dedicates Antarctica to peaceful purposes only. It outlaws measures of a military nature, such as the establishment of military bases and fortifications, the carrying out of maneuvers, and the testing of weapons. It specifies that military personnel or equipment may be used there for scientific research or any other peaceful purpose. As the United States and a few other countries have conducted their Antarctic programs with logistic support provided by their military establishments the latter provision was considered appropriate to dispel any doubt that peaceful programs could continue to be carried out in this way.

Article II provides that freedom of scientific investigation in Antarctica and cooperation toward that end, as applied during the International Geophysical Year, shall continue subject to the provisions of the treaty.

Article III contains provisions for the promotion of such international scientific cooperation. Under its terms the parties agree that scientists may be exchanged between expeditions and stations in Antarctica. The parties also shall keep one another informed of their plans for scientific programs in Antarctica and shall make freely available scientific observations. Such exchanges would be made to the extent that the parties consider it feasible and practicable. The article also encourages the establishment of cooperative working relations with those specialized agencies of the United Nations and other international organizations having a scientific or technical interest in Antarctica.

Article IV specifies that nothing in the treaty will be interpreted as a renunciation of any party's claim to sovereignty, as a renunciation or diminution of any party's basis of claim, or as prejudicing the position of any party regarding recognition or nonrecognition of another party's claim or basis of claim. The article also specifies that while the treaty is in force no acts or activities will constitute a basis for asserting, supporting or denying a claim or create any rights of sovereignty in Antarctica. It is finally provided that no new claims can be made and no existing claims enlarged while the treaty is in force.

It is believed that the manner in which the treaty deals with the sensitive problem of territorial claims is one of its most significant aspects. Seven of the twelve countries which signed the treaty have for many years asserted claims of sovereignty to portions of Antarctica, some of which overlap and have given rise to occasional frictions. The claimants are Argentina, Australia, Chile, France, New Zealand, Norway, and the United Kingdom. Neither the United States nor the Soviet Union has made any territorial claims, nor do they recognize the claims of others. Other nonclaimant countries which are signatories to the treaty are Belgium, Japan, and the Union of South Africa. In essence, article IV minimizes the possibility that disputes over claims to sovereignty will erupt and interfere with constructive scientific work in Antarctica.

Article V bans all nuclear explosions in Antarctica and the dumping there of radioactive waste material pending the conclusion of international agreements on nuclear uses. In effect this provision prevents Antarctica from being used as a nuclear proving ground or as a dumping ground for radioactive wastes. It prevents the possibility that harmful fallout will be carried to neighboring regions. However, this article does not prevent the use of nuclear energy in atomic powerplants.

Article VI establishes the zone of application of the treaty. By its terms the treaty applies to the area south of 60° south latitude, including ice shelves, that is, thick portions of ice attached to the land and extending seaward; but the rights of any state under international law with regard to the high seas within the area are not affected.

Article VII contains provisions designed to insure that the peaceful intent of the treaty is being carried out. It permits the signatory parties, and any acceding parties qualified to participate in the consultative meetings, to send observers anywhere in Antarctica at any time. The observers must be nationals of the sending party and their designation must be made known to every other party having the right to send observers. They are to have complete freedom of access to all areas of Antarctica and must be permitted to inspect stations, installations, and equipment as well as ships and aircraft at points of discharging or embarking cargoes or personnel in Antarctica. Aerial observation by any country having the right to send observers is also permitted. Parties are required to furnish advance notice of all Antarctic expeditions by their ships or nationals and all Antarctic expeditions organized in or proceeding from their territories. They must also report all stations in Antarctica occupied by their nationals and all military personnel or equipment intended to be sent to Antarctica for peaceful purposes. The requirement to give advance information would not, of course, prevent previously notified plans from being modified or revised, upon further notice, whenever advisable because of unforeseen events such as budgetary limitations, weather, or damages to ships or equipment.

Under article VIII each party has exclusive jurisdiction over its own nationals who are observers designated under the treaty for inspection purposes or scientific personnel exchanged between expeditions or stations in Antarctica, in respect of all acts or omissions, occurring while such persons are in Antarctica for the purpose of exercising their functions. Members of the staffs accompanying such persons are also covered. The positions of the parties relating to jurisdiction over all other persons in Antarctica are not affected. The parties agree to consult together immediately should any dispute arise concerning the exercise of jurisdiction in Antarctica.

Under article IX, representatives of the 12 signatory states are to meet in Canberra, Australia, within 2 months after the treaty enters into force and thereafter at times and places which they deem suitable. Their functions will be to exchange information, to consult together on matters of common interest pertaining to Antarctica, and to recommend to their governments measures in furtherance of the principles and objectives of the treaty. These measures are to become effective when approved by all of the parties who were entitled to participate in the meetings held to consider those measures.

A country which has become party to the treaty by accession may qualify to participate in the meetings during such time as it demonstrates its interest in Antarctica by conducting substantial scientific research there.

Representatives participating in the meetings will receive the reports of observers carrying out inspection under the treaty.

Regardless of whether measures to facilitate the exercise of treaty rights are adopted, all rights established by the treaty, including, of course, rights to conduct inspection, may be exercised from the date the treaty enters into force.

By article X the parties are obliged to exert appropriate efforts, consistent with the Charter of the United Nations, to see that no one engages in any activity in Antarctica contrary to the principles of the treaty. Its aim is not only to prevent such activity by nationals and organizations under the jurisdiction of the parties but to deter countries which are not parties to the treaty and their nationals and organizations, from engaging in nonpeaceful activities in Antarctica. In effect it pledges the parties not only to refrain from giving assistance to persons or countries which might engage in nonpeaceful activities or atomic tests in Antarctica, but to take active steps to discourage any such activity.

Under article XI disputes among the parties arising under the treaty are to be resolved by peaceful means of their own choice, such as arbitration, conciliation, or the like. If this proves unsuccessful, the dispute is to be referred to the International Court of Justice, with the consent of all parties to the dispute.

Article XII provides a method for modifying or amending the treaty at any time by unanimous consent of the parties entitled to participate in the consultative meetings. An amendment will enter into force when all such parties give notice that they have ratified it. Parties not entitled to participate in the meetings may accept the amendment within 2 years. If they fail to do so within that time they will be deemed to have withdrawn from the treaty.

The treaty has no specified duration, but article XII provides that after 30 years any of the parties participating in consultative meetings may ask for a conference to review the operation of the treaty. Amendments approved at such a conference by a majority of those represented, including a majority of the consultative parties, will enter into force when ratified by all of the consultative parties. If a modification or amendment approved at such a conference does not enter into force within 2 years, any country may withdraw from the treaty, effective 2 years from its notification to that effect.

Article XIII provides that the treaty will enter into force when ratified by all 12 signatory states. It contains an accession clause by which countries other than the original 12 may acquire the rights and assume the obligations embodied in the treaty. All states members of the United Nations and any other state which is unanimously invited by the consultative parties may accede.

Article XIII also names the United States as depositary government and contains other provisions of a formal nature relating to ratification, accession, and registration with the United Nations.

By article XIV the English, French, Russian, and Spanish language versions of the treaty are declared to be equally authentic.

On the occasion of the signing of the Antarctic Treaty the Governments of the United States, Argentina, and Chile declared that the treaty does not affect their obligations under the Inter-American Treaty of Reciprocal Assistance, signed at Rio de Janeiro on September 2, 1947 (62 Stat. 1681).

The U.S. representative to the Conference on Antarctica was Ambassador Herman Phleger, former Legal Adviser of the Department of State. Alternate representatives were Ambassador Paul C. Daniels and Mr. George H. Owens. The U.S. delegation included, in addition to officers of the Department of State, a representative of the Department of Defense. Congressional advisers were the Honorable FRANK CARLSON and the Honorable GALE W. MCGEE, U.S. Senators. The delegation received advice directly from the National Science Foundation, the agency responsible for coordinating the planning and management of the U.S. scientific program in Antarctica. It was also advised by a committee of six distinguished scientists appointed by the national Academy of Sciences because of their active interest in scientific investigations in Antarctica.

There is transmitted for your information, and for that of the Senate, the final act of the Conference on Antarctica, signed at Washington on December 1, 1959, by plenipotentiaries of the 12 participating nations. The final act does not require ratification.

I believe that the signing of the Antarctic Treaty is a substantial achievement. Its ratification by all of the signatory states would further, in an entire continent, peaceful cooperation in the attainment of scientific progress. It is based on the will to maintain peace in an important area of the world. The United States, which has engaged in extensive exploratory and scientific activities in Antarctica, initiated the idea of the Antarctic Treaty, which is believed to be in the best interests of this country and of all mankind. It is hoped therefore that the United States may be among the first to ratify it.

Respectfully submitted.

CHRISTIAN A. HERTER.

THE ANTARCTIC TREATY

The Governments of Argentina, Australia, Belgium, Chile, the French Republic, Japan, New Zealand, Norway, the Union of South Africa, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, and the United States of America,

Recognizing that it is in the interest of all mankind that Antarctica shall continue forever to be used exclusively for peaceful purposes and shall not become the scene or object of international discord;

Acknowledging the substantial contributions to scientific knowledge resulting from international cooperation in scientific investigation in Antarctica;

Convinced that the establishment of a firm foundation for the continuation and development of such cooperation on the basis of freedom of scientific investigation in Antarctica as applied during the International Geophysical Year accords with the interests of science and the progress of all mankind;

Convinced also that a treaty ensuring the use of Antarctica for peaceful purposes only and the continuance of international harmony in Antarctica will further the purposes and principles embodied in the Charter of the United Nations;

Have agreed as follows:

ARTICLE I

1. Antarctica shall be used for peaceful purposes only. There shall be prohibited, inter alia, any measures of a military nature, such as the establishment of military bases and fortifications, the carrying out of military maneuvers, as well as the testing of any type of weapons.

2. The present Treaty shall not prevent the use of military personnel or equipment for scientific research or for any other peaceful purpose.

ARTICLE II

Freedom of scientific investigation in Antarctica and cooperation toward that end, as applied during the International Geophysical Year, shall continue, subject to the provisions of the present Treaty.

ARTICLE III

1. In order to promote international cooperation in scientific investigation in Antarctica, as provided for in Article II of the present Treaty, the Contracting Parties agree that, to the greatest extent feasible and practicable:

(a) information regarding plans for scientific programs in Antarctica shall be exchanged to permit maximum economy and efficiency of operations;

(b) scientific personnel shall be exchanged in Antarctica between expeditions and stations;

(c) scientific observations and results from Antarctica shall be exchanged and made freely available.

2. In implementing this Article, every encouragement shall be given to the establishment of cooperative working relations with those Specialized Agencies of the United Nations and other international organizations having a scientific or technical interest in Antarctica.

ARTICLE IV

1. Nothing contained in the present Treaty shall be interpreted as:

(a) a renunciation by any Contracting Party of previously asserted rights of or claims to territorial sovereignty in Antarctica;

(b) a renunciation or diminution by any Contracting Party of any basis of claim to territorial sovereignty in Antarctica which it may have whether as a result of its activities or those of its nationals in Antarctica, or otherwise;

(c) prejudicing the position of any Contracting Party as regards its recognition or non-recognition of any other State's right of or claim or basis of claim to territorial sovereignty in Antarctica.

2. No acts or activities taking place while the present Treaty is in force shall constitute a basis for asserting, supporting or denying a claim to territorial sovereignty in Antarctica or create any rights of sovereignty in Antarctica. No new claim, or enlargement of an existing claim, to territorial sovereignty in Antarctica shall be asserted while the present Treaty is in force.

ARTICLE V

1. Any nuclear explosions in Antarctica and the disposal there of radioactive waste material shall be prohibited.

2. In the event of the conclusion of international agreements concerning the use of nuclear energy, including nuclear explosions and the disposal of radioactive waste material, to which all of the Contracting Parties whose representatives are entitled to participate in the meetings provided for under Article IX are parties, the rules established under such agreements shall apply in Antarctica.

ARTICLE VI

The provisions of the present Treaty shall apply to the area south of 60° South Latitude, including all ice shelves, but nothing in the present Treaty shall prejudice or in any way affect the rights, or the exercise of the rights, of any State under international law with regard to the high seas within that area.

The names of observers shall be communicated to every other Contracting Party having the right to designate observers, and like notice shall be given of the termination of their appointment.

2. Each observer designated in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 1 of this Article shall have complete freedom of access at any time to any or all areas of Antarctica.

3. All areas of Antarctica, including all stations, installations and equipment within those areas, and all ships and aircraft at points of discharging or embarking cargoes or personnel in Antarctica, shall be open at all times to inspection by any observers designated in accordance with paragraph 1 of this Article.

4. Aerial observation may be carried out at any time over any or all areas of Antarctica by any of the Contracting Parties having the right to designate observers.

5. Each Contracting Party shall, at the time when the present Treaty enters into force for it, inform the other Contracting Parties, and thereafter shall give them notice in advance, of

(a) all expeditions to and within Antarctica, on the part of its ships or nationals, and all expeditions to Antarctica organized in or proceeding from its territory;

(b) all stations in Antarctica occupied by its nationals; and

(c) any military personnel or equipment intended to be introduced by it into Antarctica subject to the conditions prescribed in paragraph 2 of Article I of the present Treaty.

ARTICLE VIII

2. Without prejudice to the provisions of paragraph 1 of this Article, and pending the adoption of measures in pursuance of subparagraph 1(e) of Article IX, the Contracting Parties concerned in any case of dispute with regard to the exercise of jurisdiction in Antarctica shall immediately consult together with a view to reaching a mutually acceptable solution.

ARTICLE IX

1. Representatives of the Contracting Parties named in the preamble to the present Treaty shall meet at the City of Canberra within two months, after the date of entry into force of the Treaty, and thereafter at suitable intervals and places, for the purpose of exchanging information, consulting together on matters of common interest pertaining to Antarctica, and formulating and considering, and recommending to their Governments, measures in furtherance of the principles and objectives of the Treaty, including measures regarding:

5. Any or all of the rights established in the present Treaty may be exercised as from the date of entry into force of the Treaty whether or not any measures facilitating the exercise of such rights have been proposed, considered or approved as provided in this Article.

ARTICLE X

Each of the Contracting Parties undertakes to exert appropriate efforts, consistent with the Charter of the United Nations, to the end that no one engages in any activity in Antarctica contrary to the principles or purposes of the present Treaty.

ARTICLE XI

1. If any dispute arises between two or more of the Contracting Parties concerning the interpretation or application of the present Treaty, those Contracting Parties shall consult among themselves with a view to having the dispute resolved by negotiation, inquiry, mediation, conciliation, arbitration, judicial settlement or other peaceful means of their own choice.

2. Any dispute of this character not so resolved shall, with the consent, in each case, of all parties to the dispute, be referred to the International Court of Justice for settlement; but failure to reach agreement on reference to the International Court shall not absolve parties to the dispute from the responsibility of continuing to seek to resolve it by any of the various peaceful means referred to in paragraph 1 of this Article.

ARTICLE XII

1. (a) The present Treaty may be modified or amended at any time by unanimous agreement of the Contracting Parties whose representatives are entitled to participate in the meetings provided for under Article IX. (b) Such modification or amendment shall thereafter enter into force as to any other Contracting Party when notice of ratification by it has been received by the depositary Government. Any such Contracting Party from which no notice of ratification is received within a period of two years from the date of entry into force of the modification or amendment in accordance with the provisions of subparagraph 1(a) of this Article shall be deemed to have withdrawn from the present Treaty on the date of the expiration of such period.

2. (a) If after the expiration of thirty years from the date of entry into force of the present Treaty, any of the Contracting Parties whose representatives are entitled to participate in the meetings provided for under Article IX so requests by a communication addressed to the depositary Government, a Conference of all the Contracting Parties shall be held as soon as practicable to review the operation of the Treaty.

(b) Any modification or amendment to the present Treaty which is approved at such a Conference by a majority of the Contracting Parties there represented, including a majority of those whose representatives are entitled to participate in the meetings provided for under Article IX, shall be communicated by the depositary Government to all the Contracting Parties immediately after the termination of the Conference and shall enter into force in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 1 of the present Article.

(c) If any such modification or amendment has not entered into force in accordance with the provisions of subparagraph 1(a) of this Article within a period of two years after the date of its communication to all the Contracting Parties, any Contracting Party may at any time after the expiration of that period give notice to the depositary Government of its withdrawal from the present Treaty; and such withdrawal shall take effect two years after the receipt of the notice by the depositary Government.

ARTICLE XIII

1. The present Treaty shall be subject to ratification by the signatory States. It shall be open for accession by any State which is a Member of the United Nations, or by any other State which may be invited to accede to the Treaty with the consent of all the Contracting Parties whose representatives are entitled to participate in the meetings provided for under Article IX of the Treaty.

2. Ratification of or accession to the present Treaty shall be effected by each State in accordance with its constitutional processes.

3. Instruments of ratification and instruments of accession shall be deposited with the Government of the United States of America, hereby designated as the depositary Government.

4. The depositary Government shall inform all signatory and acceding States of the date of each deposit of an instrument of ratification or accession, and the date of entry into force of the Treaty and of any modification or amendment thereto.

5. Upon the deposit of instruments of ratification by all the signatory States, the present Treaty shall enter into force for those States and for States which have deposited instruments of accession. Thereafter the Treaty shall enter into force for any acceding State upon the deposit of its instrument of accession.

6. The present Treaty shall be registered by the depositary Government pursuant to Article 102 of the Charter of the United Nations.

ARTICLE XIV

The present Treaty, done in the English, French, Russian and Spanish languages, each version being equally authentic, shall be deposited in the archives of the Government of the United States of America, which shall transmit duly certified copies thereof to the Governments of the signatory and acceding States.

TEXT OF UNITED STATES NOTE OF MAY 2, 1958[1]

EXCELLENCY: I have the honor to refer to the splendid example of international cooperation which can now be observed in many parts of the world because of the coordinated efforts of scientists of many countries in seeking a better understanding of geophysical phenomena during the current International Geophysical Year. These coordinated efforts of the scientists of many lands have as their objective a greatly increased knowledge of the planet on which we live and will no doubt contribute directly and indirectly to the welfare of the human race for many generations to come.

Among the various portions of the globe where these cooperative scientific endeavors are being carried on with singular success and with a sincere consciousness of the high ideals of mankind to which they are dedicated is the vast and relatively remote continent of Antarctica. The scientific research being conducted in that continent by the cooperative efforts of distinguished scientists from many countries is producing information of practical as well as theoretical value for all mankind.

The International Geophysical Year comes to a close at the end of 1958. The need for coordinated scientific research in Antarctica, however, will continue for many more years into the future. Accordingly it would appear desirable for those countries participating in the Antarctic program of the International Geophysical Year to reach agreement among themselves on a program to assure the continuation of the fruitful scientific cooperation referred to above. Such an arrangement could have the additional advantage of preventing unnecessary and undesirable political rivalries in that continent, the uneconomic expenditure of funds to defend individual national interests, and the recurrent possibility of international misunderstanding. It would appear that if harmonious agreement can be reached among the countries directly concerned in regard to friendly cooperation in Antarctica, there would be advantages not only to those countries but to all other countries as well.

The present situation in Antarctica is characterized by diverse legal, political, and administrative concepts which render friendly cooperation difficult in the absence of an understanding among the countries involved. Seven countries have asserted claims of sovereignty to portions of Antarctica, some of which overlap and give rise to occasional frictions. Other countries have a direct interest in that continent based on past discovery and exploration, geographic proximity, sea and air transportation routes and other considerations.

The United States for many years has had, and at the present time continues to have, direct and substantial rights and interests in Antarctica. Throughout a period of many years commencing in the early 1800's, many areas of the Antarctic region have been discovered, sighted, explored, and claimed on behalf of the United States by nationals of the United States and by expeditions carrying the flag of the United States. During this period, the Government of the United States and its nationals have engaged in well known and extensive activities in Antarctica.

[1] Addressed to the Foreign Ministers of each of the 11 other countries participating in the International Geophysical Year activities in Antarctica: Argentina, Australia, Belgium, Chile, France, Japan, New Zealand, Norway, the Union of South Africa, the U.S.S.R., and the United Kingdom. Each note was signed and delivered by the American ambassador to that country.

In view of the activities of the United States and its nationals referred to above, my Government reserves all of the rights of the United States with respect to the Antarctic region, including the right to assert a territorial claim or claims.

It is the opinion of my Government, however, that the interests of mankind would best be served in consonance with the high ideals of the Charter of the United Nations, if the countries which have a direct interest in Antarctica were to join together in the conclusion of a treaty which would have the following peaceful purposes:

A. Freedom of scientific investigation throughout Antarctica by citizens, organizations, and governments of all countries; and a continuation of the international scientific cooperation which is being carried out so successfully during the current International Geophysical Year.

B. International agreement to insure that Antarctica be used for peaceful purposes only.

C. Any other peaceful purposes not inconsistent with the Charter of the United Nations.

The Government of the United States is prepared to discuss jointly with the governments of the other countries having a direct interest in Antarctica the possibility of concluding an agreement, which would be in the form of a treaty, for the purpose of giving legal effect to these high principles. It is believed that such a treaty can be concluded without requiring any participating nation to renounce whatever basic historic rights it may have in Antarctica, or whatever claims of sovereignty it may have asserted. It could be specifically provided that such basic rights and such claims would remain unaffected while the treaty is in force, and that no new rights would be acquired and no new claims made by any country during the duration of the treaty. In other words the legal status quo in Antarctica would be frozen for the duration of the treaty, permitting cooperation in scientific and administrative matters to be carried out in a constructive manner without being hampered or affected in any way by political considerations. Provision could likewise be made for such joint administrative arrangements as might be necessary and desirable to insure the successful accomplishment of the agreed objectives. The proposed treaty would be deposited with the United Nations, and the cooperation of the specialized technical agencies of the United Nations would be sought. Such an arrangement would provide a firm and favorable foundation for a continuation of the productive activities which have thus far distinguished the International Geophysical Year; would provide an agreed basis for the maintenance of peaceful and orderly conditions in Antarctica during years to come; and would avoid the possibility of that continent becoming the scene of international discord.

In the hope that the countries having a direct interest in Antarctica will agree on the desirability of the aforesaid high objectives, and will work together in an effort to convert them into practical realities, the Government of the United States has the honor to invite the Government of _____ to participate in a Conference for this purpose to be convened at an early date at such place as may be mutually agreeable.

Accept, Excellency, the renewed assurances of my highest consideration.

At the opening Plenary Session of the Conference the Honorable Herman Phleger, Head of the United States Delegation, was elected Chairman of the Conference. Mr. Henry E. Allen was appointed Secretary General of the Conference and Rapporteur.

The Conference established two Committees under rotating chairmanship to deal with the items on the agenda of the Conference. Following initial consideration of such items, these Committees were reconstituted as a Committee of the Whole. There were also established a Credentials Committee, a Drafting Committee, and a Committee on Style.

The final session of the Conference was held on December 1, 1959.

As a result of the deliberations of the Conference, as recorded in the summary records and reports of the respective Committees and of the Plenary Sessions, the Conference formulated and submitted for signature on December 1, 1959, the Antarctic Treaty.

The Conference recommended to the participating Governments that they appoint representatives to meet in Washington within two months after the signing of the Treaty and thereafter at such times as may be convenient, pending the entry into force of the Treaty, to consult together and to recommend to their Governments such interim arrangements regarding the matters dealt with in the Treaty as they may deem desirable.

In witness whereof, the following Plenipotentiaries sign this Final Act.

Done at Washington this first day of December, one thousand nine hundred and fifty-nine, in the English, French, Russian and Spanish languages, each version being equally authentic, in a single original which shall be deposited in the archives of the Government of the United States of America. The Government of the United States of America shall transmit certified copies thereof to all the other Governments represented at the Conference.

By BARBARA HARTMAN,
Authentication Officer, Department of State.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an excerpt from the committee report on the Antarctic Treaty, so that the Senate as a whole may have the benefit of the deliberations of the Committee on Foreign Relations, which heard the testimony given before the committee by those opposed to and in favor of the treaty.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

1. PURPOSES OF THE TREATY

Twelve countries are signatories of the treaty: the United States, the Soviet Union, and 10 other nations, including all 7 which have advanced territorial claims to Antarctica. Through the treaty, these countries accept the following objectives: the Antarctic Continent and surrounding areas shall be used exclusively for peaceful purposes; nuclear explosions and radioactive waste disposal shall be banned in the treaty area; no territorial claims or rights shall either be recognized or affected; freedom of scientific investigation shall be maintained and international cooperation to that end promoted; and complete rights of unilateral inspection shall insure fulfillment of these objectives. The overall purpose thus is to neutralize Antarctica and obviate future conflicts between nations so that knowledge may be derived from the continent to benefit all mankind.

2. BACKGROUND

In May 1958 the United States sent identical notes to each of the 11 other countries[1] which participated in the Antarctic program of the International Geophysical Year (IGY) of 1957–58, inviting them to join in a conference aimed at formulating a treaty on Antarctica. In so doing, the United States was mindful of broadened interest in and claims to Antarctica by several countries, conflicts between Britain, Argentina, and Chile because of their overlapping claims, the refusal of the latter two nations to permit the question to be taken to the International Court of Justice, and the failure of U.S. efforts in 1948 to arrange a conference with the seven claimants looking toward a settlement of territorial interests. Added to these considerations was the fact that the U.S.S.R. had engaged in extensive activities during the IGY and had a number of bases in the Australian-claimed portion of Antarctica which it showed every intention of maintaining. The United States, therefore, was concerned lest the great benefits of international scientific cooperation derived from the IGY should end with the close of 1958, to be replaced by future national disputes and militant maneuvers. Friendly interest in such an endeavor, informally expressed by several projected treaty members, also stimulated U.S. adoption of the initiative.

All 11 governments accepted the U.S. invitation, and their representatives held extensive informal preparatory talks in Washington. The working papers developed in these talks formed the basis of discussion when the Conference on Antarctica convened on October 15, 1959. Six weeks of deliberations led to the signing of the treaty by all countries on December 1; at which time a final act, not requiring ratification, was also signed.

3. COMMITTEE ACTION

On February 15, 1960, the President of the United States transmitted the Antarctic Treaty to the Senate recommending early and favorable consideration. The President, in his message of transmittal stated that "this is a unique and historic treaty. It provides that a large area of the world—an area equal in size to Europe and the United States combined—will be used for peaceful purposes only * * *. The spirit of cooperation and mutual understanding with which representatives of the 12 countries drafted the Antarctic Treaty and signed it for their respective governments is an inspiring example of what can be accomplished by international cooperation in the field of science and in the pursuit of peace."

The treaty, the President's message, and accompanying papers were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. The committee held public hearings on June 14, at which time the main administration witness for the treaty was the Honorable Herman Phleger, former legal adviser of the Department of State and head of the U.S. delegation at the Conference on Antarctica. The administration case for the treaty was continued by Rear Adm. David M. Tyree, Antarctic projects officer, representing the Department of Defense. Favorable testimony was also presented by Dr. Laurence M. Gould of the National Academy of Sciences, and by Dr. Philip C. Jessup, professor of international law at Columbia University. Testimony opposed to the treaty was presented by Senator Clair Engle, Senator Ernest Gruening, Representative John R. Pillion, Mr. Edouard A. Stackpole, and Miss Elizabeth A. Kendall.

In executive session on June 21 the committee, without a dissenting vote, ordered the treaty reported favorably to the Senate.

4. PROVISIONS OF THE TREATY

The Antarctic Treaty consists of a preamble and 14 articles. The preamble sets forth the objectives of the signatories and expresses the conviction that the treaty "* * * will further the purposes and principles embodied in the Charter of the United Nations."

The first three articles provide that measures of a military nature, excluding the use of military personnel and equipment for peaceful purposes, shall be prohibited; that freedom of scientific investigation shall continue as during the IGY; and that measures to promote international scientific cooperation shall include exchanges of plans, personnel, and data among the contracting parties.

Article IV deals with the difficult and sensitive question of territorial claims and rights. It provides that the claims, bases of claims and rights—asserted or latent—of the contracting nations are not in any way affected by the treaty; nor is there any change in the position of each nation regarding the claims or rights of others. Moreover, no activity in Antarctica during the period of the treaty shall affect the current claims situation, and no new or enlarged claims shall be asserted for the duration of the treaty. In effect, then, the question of territorial claims and rights is "frozen" while the treaty is in force. It should be noted in this connection that the U.S. Government, in the initiative of May 1958, expressly stated and reserved all the rights of the United States, including that of asserting a claim.

Article V prohibits nuclear explosions and radioactive waste disposal, but does not bar the use of atomic powerplants in Antarctica for heat and light. It also would not prevent the terms of any future international agreement on the uses of nuclear energy being applied to Antarctica.

Article VI states that the treaty covers the area south of 60° S. latitude, including ice shelves, but does not affect the question of any nation's access to the high seas.

Articles VII and VIII relate to the system of inspection and to the exclusive jurisdiction of a contracting party over its own nationals regardless of their whereabouts in the treaty area. Each original treaty member, as well as any country acceding in future and becoming active in the area, shall have the right to name its own national observers. These observers shall have complete freedom of access at any time to all areas of Antarctica, including all installations, equipment, and means of transport within the areas. The contracting parties will tender the names of their observers to each other, and will inform each other in full as to all activities, equipment, and personnel on a continuing basis. The unrestricted right of aerial observation should be especially noted as consonant with President Eisenhower's "open skies" proposal.

Disputes between two or more contracting parties, according to article XI, should be resolved through consultation and means of their own choice. If not so resolved, any dispute may be referred to the International Court of Justice, but only with the consent of all parties to the dispute. In this connection, while the United States and the majority of the contracting parties were willing to accept compulsory jurisdiction by the International Court, the opposition of three signatories negated that proposal.

When all 12 contracting parties have ratified and the treaty has entered into force, it is provided under article IX that, within 2 months representatives of those nations would meet at Canberra to consider measures in furtherance of the treaty. Such meetings would occur thereafter at suitable intervals and places. Representation on this essentially administrative body would be automatic for the 12 original signatories, but in the case of any other acceding country would be contingent upon a demonstration of active interest in Antarctica through substantial scientific research activity there. This matter is interconnected with article XIII, which provides that the treaty shall be open for accession by any United Nations member, or by any other nation unanimously invited to accede by those contracting parties (hereinafter named the "consultative parties") entitled to participate in the above-mentioned meetings under article IX.

Amendment and duration of the treaty are covered by article XII. The treaty may be modified or amended at any time, but only by unanimous agreement of the consultative parties. While the treaty has no specified duration, it is provided that after 30 years any of the consultative parties may request a conference of all treaty members to review the operation of the treaty. Amendments approved at such a conference by a majority of those represented, including a majority of the consultative parties, will enter into force when ratified by all of the latter parties. Any country may withdraw from the treaty, effective 2 years after notification, if an amendment approved at such a conference does not enter into force within 2 years.

5. DISCUSSION OF OPPOSITION VIEWS

The two major and intertwined concerns of those opposed to the treaty are, first, the fact that the U.S.S.R. is among the 12 signatories; and, secondly, that the United States, despite its notable record of Antarctic exploration, has failed to make official claims based upon that record. Not only is there reluctance to enter into an agreement with the Soviet Union in view of its past practices with respect to treaties, but there is also opposition to what is considered a gratuitous invitation to the U.S.S.R. to enter the Antarctic on a basis of equality with nations possessing legitimate rights in the area.

On this question of Soviet participation, the central fact is that the U.S.S.R. has had scientific bases in Antarctica for several years and shows every sign of remaining there. To date, the Soviet Union has made no official claim beyond that of discovering Antarctica (based on the Bellingshausen voyage of 1819–21). It stated as early as 1948, however, that it had a rightful voice in whatever arrangements were made for the continent, and that it would not recognize any that were reached without its participation and consent.

Following its acceptance of the international scientific community's invitation to play a role in the IGY, the Soviet Union unexpectedly revealed that it planned an Antarctic expedition of considerable size. Indeed, next to the U.S. effort, the Soviet expedition was the most elaborate one to go to the continent in the 1955–56 season. During the IGY, Soviet participation was generally nonpolitical and cooperative, and there was no evidence that it had any but legitimate scientific aspects compatible with long experience in the Arctic regions.

Therefore, the treaty does not create a Soviet presence in Antarctica but merely deals with an existing situation. It does not give the U.S.S.R. any rights which it would not otherwise possess; specifically, it only confirms that the United States and the Soviet Union, neither of them having made official territorial claims, refuse to recognize the claims of others. Beyond these negative factors, the treaty also gives the signatories positive opportunities to cooperate both in their own self-interest and in the interest of world peace.

With regard to future Soviet adherence, opponents of the treaty seem to argue in opposite directions: on the one hand, they say that the U.S.S.R. will receive benefits which it does not now possess; on the other, they intimate that it will not observe the treaty. The obvious fact is that nations generally will ratify and respect those agreements that serve their national interests. It seems clear that the removal of a possible cause of military conflict and the preservation of freedom of movement and scientific inquiry are in the best interests of all nations. However, should the treaty be broken for any reason, the situation would revert to currently existing conditions. The language of the treaty is as conclusive as possible on this point, according to those most learned in international law who testified before the committee.

With regard to the argument that the United States should jettison a treaty which it initiated in favor of making an official territorial claim, proponents of this view not only fail to show any advantages but they ignore its disadvantages. The only territory yet unclaimed is that one-sixth of the continent between 90° and 150° W. longitude, possibly the least accessible and rewarding area of Antarctica. There already seems to be a tacit understanding among the claimants that this area should be reserved to the United States because of the extensive explorations of Admiral Byrd, his companions and successors. Short of making broader claims which would immediately embroil our relations with friendly countries, this is the one area open to us. If the United States were now to exercise this option, it would logically have to recognize the claims of other countries based on the same considerations of discovery, exploration and sporadic occupation. In return for this fraction, the United States would jeopardize its reserved rights of free access to all of Antarctica. Moreover, such a move would not be recognized by the Soviet Union, which, possibly along with other countries, might be stimulated to make official claims also. Many supporters of the present treaty regret that the United States did not make claims many years ago, but they recognize that the clock cannot be turned back.

Presumably, one of the main reasons why opponents of the treaty urge the United States to make official claims stems from the supposedly great economic potential of Antarctica. On this point, the noted geologist and Antarctic expert, Dr. Laurence Gould, who was second in command of the first Byrd expedition, not only declared that the continent's vast, low-grade lignite coal deposits are commercially worthless, but testified as follows:

"I would not give a nickel for all the mineral resources I know in Antarctica. The point is we don't know and to predicate a program or to presume that vast resources are there is nonsense. We haven't examined 1 percent of the area geologically. * * * So that for many, many years to come * * * the most important export of Antarctica is going to be its scientific data. And that is terribly important indeed. There is no single field of geophysics which does not demand for its completion data which can come only from Antarctica."

In any event, the treaty does not deal with economic considerations. If some valuable discovery were made in the future, it theoretically would be handled under the same conditions as now exist in the absence of a treaty. Practically, however, experience accumulated by the consultative parties might by that time result in a better disposition of the resource than would occur at present.

One further source of opposition is dissatisfaction with the ban on nuclear explosions and radioactive waste disposal, which is regarded as premature and contrary to the interests of populated world areas, as well as detrimental to the cause of Antarctic exploitation. The fact is that Southern Hemisphere countries, keenly aware that their weather systems originate in Antarctica, insisted on that prohibition. Here again, in the absence of a treaty, there are considerations which the United States, at least, would not wish to flout.

6. CONCLUSIONS

The Committee on Foreign Relations considers that the Antarctic Treaty is a notable instance of U.S. initiative, preceded by careful planning and followed by patient and skillful negotiations. The committee understands that the President took an unusually strong personal interest in the treaty, and that drafts of the various articles were cleared with all interested governmental agencies. It was especially glad to receive assurances of full support for the treaty from the Department of Defense spokesman.

The arguments presented in opposition to the treaty were carefully considered, but the committee did not find them at all persuasive. In particular, it noted that opponents did not offer any feasible alternative method of preventing disputes and national aggrandizement, and of insuring cooperative access to the scientific data of the entire continent. While the risks of entering into agreements with Communist countries are not discounted, the committee subscribes to the belief that a breakdown in communications between the Communist bloc and the free world is an immeasurably greater risk. It believes it is in the interests of the United States to arrive at an agreement with the U.S.S.R. in an area where mutual interests appear to coincide rather than diverge. The alternative to this course of action seems to entail drawing Antarctica into the arena of global conflict. Furthermore, it is considered that this treaty could set a valuable precedent for dealing with new situations arising in the space age.

Although the United Kingdom and the Union of South Africa have already ratified the Antarctic Treaty, the likelihood is that most of the contracting parties will await action by the United States as the initiating power.

The committee believes that the pending treaty will serve the best interests of the United States and its friends and allies, and will promote the overall cause of world peace. Therefore, it recommends that the Senate give its advice and consent to ratification of the Antarctic Treaty.

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. President, I rise in opposition to the ratification of this treaty.

The Antarctic Treaty, signed by the United States and 11 other nations on December 1, 1959, will alter the destiny of an entire continent if it is allowed to enter into force.

Mr. President, the area involved under the treaty is larger than the United States of America plus all of Europe. Because of its profound significance, the treaty must be considered carefully in terms of the national interest of this country. Measured in these terms, it seems clear that the United States will lose far more than it will gain if it ratifies the treaty.

The national interest has many dimensions, all of which must be weighed in coming to a decision on the treaty which would place Antarctica under the control of 12 nations. One of these is political: Will the treaty protect the rights of the United States and add to its power and its ability to influence events in the world? Will it enhance the prospects of a just peace? Another is strategic: Will the treaty help the United States to defend its own territory and participate in the defense of the free world? Still another is economic: Will the treaty give assurance that Americans will be able to share in the future economic development of Antarctica? Does it provide the best means of bringing about the development of Antarctica?

Consideration of any one of these questions shows that the treaty would not advance the national interest of the United States. Moreover, the Soviet Union would be the principal beneficiary of the well-intentioned but unwise generosity which the United States exhibits in giving up its preeminent position in Antarctica.

Mr. President, the United States has solid claims to some 80 percent of the Antarctic. The Soviets have none. We are trading what I would call a horse for a rabbit to get the concessions the treaty would grant in the way of international amity and accord.

THE TREATY IN WORLD POLITICS

Mr. President, first I wish to deal with the matter of the treaty in world politics.

The principal change which would be wrought by the treaty would be to place

Antarctica under the joint supervision of the 12 signatory states, one of which is the Soviet Union. Each of the 12 states would have an equal voice, and measures to facilitate the carrying out of the treaty would require unanimity among them. This means that the Soviet Union could veto measures agreed upon by all the other signatories. The precise amount of harm which might be done by this provision cannot be estimated because of the vagueness of the treaty concerning the powers of the 12-nation group. Nevertheless, the experience of the Security Council should be a warning in regard to what the Soviet Union may do. We recall that only in the last few days the Soviet Union exercised its veto in the Security Council, to prevent the passage of the resolution which would have permitted an impartial inquiry into the shooting down of the B–47 over international waters.

Internationalization has been put forward by proponents of the treaty as a solution to the unresolved problem of territorial sovereignty in the Antarctic. Seven nations have claims to portions of Antarctica, and in one portion three nations have claims which overlap. None of the claims has become firmly established, and some of the territory has not yet been claimed by any nation. The treaty's proponents contend that without internationalization Antarctica will become the subject of international disputes.

It is certainly true that it would be an invitation to disputes to allow Antarctica to continue indefinitely in the uncertain legal status which it has held in the past. However, the conflicting claims could be resolved and future problems prevented in ways more advantageous to the United States than that provided by the current treaty.

The most obvious solution would simply require that the United States make an official claim to that part of Antarctica in which it has clear rights. As a minimum, this would constitute the entire sector which is at present unclaimed, the sector stretching between 150° and 90° west longitude. A claim in this area would be welcomed by the other claimant states, all of which are our allies, for it would demonstrate that the United States recognized the importance of keeping Antarctica in the hands of the free world. This claim might be extended after careful study of the history of activities in the Antarctic area, with any conflicts decided among the United States and those countries which have taken a major interest in Antarctica over a long period of time and concretely demonstrated that interest by asserting claims. For example, the principal U.S. base (Naval Air Base McMurdo) is located within the New Zealand-claimed area, and the Marble Point proposed airfield is also in the same New Zealand area. However, it may be possible, by individual agreements between the two nations, to work out a satisfactory solution without the sanction of all the countries involved.

Certainly it would be much easier, Mr. President, to work out such an agreement with the other nation involved, which is our friend and ally, than to work out the agreement under a 12-nation pact provided by the treaty, to which the Soviet Union would be a party and as to which the Soviet Union could, as it does in the Security Council, exercise the right of veto.

U.S. RIGHTS

With respect to U.S. rights, there is no doubt that the United States has the legal right to territorial sovereignty over a large portion of Antarctica. It could base its claim on discoveries, explorations, occupations, or performance of administrative acts, the main bases for the claims which have been filed to date. These are the historic bases of claims made throughout all the history of the world to areas throughout the world. On any basis that sovereignty over new territory is determined, the United States has a sound position. An example is discovery. American investigators believe that the continent of Antarctica was first sighted by Nathaniel Brown Palmer, an American sealing captain, on November 17, 1820. As the distinguished junior Senator from Montana said, the Soviet Union first got into the area in 1956. Nineteen years later, in 1839, Adm. Charles Wilkes made a voyage more than halfway around Antarctica and demonstrated the existence of a continental land mass.

The American rights based upon early discoveries are strengthened by the outstanding American role in exploring the continent.

Foremost among the brave and dedicated men who have planted the American flag in Antarctica was Adm. Richard E. Byrd. Although he first achieved worldwide fame in 1926 when he became the first man to fly over the North Pole, Byrd's name will always be linked with his beloved Antarctic continent.

ACHIEVEMENTS OF ADMIRAL BYRD

I wish to speak briefly now of the achievements of Admiral Byrd, because on his exploration, on his work, and on his sacrifice as well as his dedication, are based a great part of America's claims to the Antarctic.

During his five trips to Antarctica, Admiral Byrd saw more unknown area there than any other man in history. His achievement and continuous dedication to Antarctica from 1928 until his death in 1957, fired American interest in the area. During these three decades, the United States explored more antarctic territory than all other nations combined.

Yet we are prepared to throw in our lot with everyone else, including the Soviet Union, which has no claims whatsoever.

Byrd's first expedition sailed to Antarctica in September 1928. All the world knows the base he established then as Little America. This expedition saw approximately 150,000 square miles and mapped large sections. Byrd named Marie Byrd Land in honor of his wife and discovered the Edsel Ford, Rockefeller, and Grosvenor mountain ranges. It was on this expedition, on November 29, 1929, that Byrd and three companions became the first men to fly over the South Pole, a courageous feat. In the course of the flight, Byrd was forced to have hundreds of pounds of precious food thrown overboard so that the plane could rise above a glacier of unexpected height.

In 1933 Byrd returned to Antarctica with a second expedition which concentrated on scientific work and used tractors more extensively than ever before. He set up an advance weather base and manned it alone from March 28 through August 10, 1934. Never before had anyone wintered so far south. During his vigil, Byrd almost died from exhaust fumes from a motor and a faulty stove. That expedition brought back aerial photographs of almost a half million square miles of unexplored territory, plus invaluable weather data and meteorological studies. It served many other branches of science, as well.

The year 1935 was an epic year in the saga of American exploration of the vast wilderness of Antarctica. In that year, Lincoln Ellsworth, with Herbert Hollick-Kenyon—Canadian—flew in an aircraft called the Polar Star, from Dundee Island in the northern part of the Antarctic Archipelago, over the Bay of Whales—Admiral Byrd's Little America—2,300 miles away. The trip was made in six stages, the last one by sled after the exhaustion of the fuel of their aircraft. They reached Little America on December 15 and were picked up at this point on January 15, 1936, by the Discovery II, an Arctic research ship. The new territory between Hearst Land and Marie Byrd Land, 80° to 120° West, was named James W. Ellsworth and claimed for the United States. A high, midcontinental plateau was named for Hollick-Kenyon, the pilot. Ellsworth also discovered the 12,000-foot Eternity Range in Hearst Land and the Sentinel Range in James W. Ellsworth Land. Between 1938 and 1939, Lincoln Ellsworth, on another expedition, surveyed a large part of eastern Antarctica, by air, "claiming some 430,000 square miles for the United States." The Australian Government at once protested against this claim.

On May 19, 1936, the National Geographic Society honored the Byrd Antarctic Expedition before a distinguished audience. In making the presentation, Dr. Grosvenor said in part:

> To many, a map of the world is the greatest of all epic poems. The map's lines and color show the realization of great dreams. * * * Magellan dreamed that he could sail around the world: Columbus dreamed of sailing westward, which added a hemisphere to the known world. Of all living explorers, he who has seen most of his dreams come true is Rear Adm. Richard E. Byrd, whom we honor tonight.

Dr. Grosvenor said further:

> Admiral Byrd's first expedition carried the American flag 1,500 miles farther south than it had been before. In the lowest temperatures and fiercest winds of our globe, he flew airplanes more than 7,000 miles, making camera surveys of expanses larger than the area of all our Atlantic seaboard States * * *. Admiral Byrd, we welcome you as the pioneer of the new era of exploration, as one who has utilized the airplane, the radio and many other inventions of American genius * * *. We further claim you as the gallant leader of men whose ability and concern for their safety have won their admiration and their loyalty.

In Admiral Byrd's reply, accepting the citation from Dr. Grosvenor of the National Geographic Society, he said:

As to geography, we have discovered and taken possession of for the United States, a land area as large as the combined Atlantic seaboard States from Maine to Georgia. There can be no controversy concerning the ownership of this land, for it is beyond the British claim and no human eye other than that of American citizens has ever looked down upon this land.

There are other interesting changes in the map, for example: The National Geographic Society's map of Antarctica shows a great white unknown blank space about 150,000 miles in area, north of the 75th parallel of latitude and between longitude 120 and 60 west. By ship and airplane we wiped that area off the map as a white, unknown space and put it into the column of the known, by proving it to be a part of the great Pacific Ocean.

Admiral Byrd has indicated what he did, what he saw, and what he claimed possession of for the United States of America as an explorer in the same fashion that Columbus claimed the American Continent at one time.

Admiral Byrd indicated:

The total area brought within the range of vision of the aerial or surface parties operating from Little America as a base was approximately 450,000 square miles. Of this, 290,000 miles were previously unknown. At sea, in the neighborhood of 160,000 square miles of unknown waters were explored. Thus, a grand total of new land and sea of roughly 450,000 square miles was added to the map.

The airplanes flew a total of 26,000 miles without accident, under the leadership of June, due to the remarkable record of the aviation personnel. As our Condor plane, the William Horlick, penetrated into various areas never before seen, the area was mapped, while the plane sped along at 125 miles an hour, with the great mapping camera. This, to me, has been a romance.

This is Admiral Byrd speaking. He claimed this area on the basis of aerial photography, not on the basis of putting his foot upon the shore. He claimed everything that was contiguous to the place he stepped on. He flew over it, he photographed it, and he claimed it in the name and as a possession of the United States of America.

I continue with the quotation from Admiral Byrd:

Tractors proved successful in polar regions for the first time, covering a total of 12,000 miles. Dogmen did superbly a total of 7,500 miles. Dogs are still the infantry of the polar regions.

Admiral Byrd once said:

Candidly, at this moment, Antarctica is asleep as far as we can calculate its value to modern civilization, but no one except God can tell how long it will remain asleep. Immense beds of coal have been hinted as existing. Coal deposits are located in the mountains, but there are practical difficulties involved in reaching them. At one time, Antarctica possessed what must have been a comparatively mild, humid climate—warm enough and genial enough to support a flourishing land flora with strongly developed trees and with swamp or forest vegetation capable of forming beds of coal which probably extended across the pole.

In 1939, Admiral Byrd was designated by President Roosevelt as commanding officer of the U.S. Antarctic Service. This was the third time. About that time a distinguished Senator of the United States, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], who will speak on this subject later, had a hand in authorizing these trips, and he knows what they were authorized for. The great expenditure from the American Treasury and the loss of human life of Americans that occurred in the Antarctic occurred because our people wanted to claim that territory for America and as a part of American sovereignty. This treaty would relinquish that effort and work.

Extensive new operations were planned, with the objectives being not only scientific, but also the establishment of permanent bases which would assist in supporting American sovereignty claims. A State Department policy study, undertaken a few months before at the request of President Roosevelt, had pointed out the need to protect American rights in the area in view of the activities of other nations.

I only wish the State Department had been a little more vigilant in that regard and a little more aggressive in recent years.

Members of the expedition were cautioned by the President's order not to take any action which would compromise the U.S. position of not recognizing any claim of sovereignty in the Antarctic regions by any foreign state. They were authorized to "take any appropriate steps such as dropping written claims from airplanes, depositing such writing in cairns, and so forth, which might assist in supporting a sovereignty claim by the United States."

All over Antarctica, someday, there will be discovered those articles, establishing American sovereignty and American claims.

The Antarctic Service established two bases and explored and mapped an additional hundred thousand square miles, including the discovery of the Thurston Peninsula area. Unfortunately, the outbreak of the Second World War forced the abandonment of the plan to have permanent bases with each year a new group of men replacing those who had stayed over the winter.

During the war, Admiral Byrd played a vital role in locating naval bases in the Pacific. Even before the war was over, however, he was looking forward to returning to establish new bases in Antarctica. He conceived a plan for a three-front assault on the Antarctic Continent, with extensive use of airplanes which would permit learning in a few weeks more than had been learned in an entire century. He obtained approval for the plan and at the end of 1946 was on his way again to Antarctica, this time as officer in charge of the U.S. Navy Antarctica development project 1947—which was given the name of Operation Highjump. Comprising 13 ships and more than 4,000 men, Operation Highjump still ranks as the largest expedition ever sent to the Antarctic.

Adm. Richard E. Byrd spent his entire adult life in the service of his country. As a result of his adventurous spirit, his personal bravery, his initiative, and his perseverance, the United States earned the right to claim sovereignty over a large portion of Antarctica. We have not yet done so, but it is still not too late. However, time will not stand still and wait for us. Already a treaty has been signed which would in effect mean giving up our rights to sovereignty over any part of Antarctica.

For Antarctica Admiral Byrd and many other Americans sacrificed months of life away from their homes and families. They regularly suffered from frozen chins or noses and the physical discomforts of extreme cold. They risked death in the crossing of deep crevasses, the exploration of unknown territory, and in simply keeping alive at temperatures far below zero or in blinding blizzards. However, they gained the satisfaction of protecting and promoting the national interest of the United States.

What a great loss it would be if now the products of their labor were given away. How little appreciation for their heroic efforts we would show if we gave away their discoveries as though they were valueless. The loss would not be theirs, however, but ours, the people of the United States. Under our control, Antarctica would be an asset to the defense of the free world, but under enemy control it would endanger us. The continent is a reservoir of mineral resources which in the future may be necessary to replace depleted natural resources elsewhere. Above all, however, the United States has earned the right to sovereignty in Antarctica by the toil and daring of such men as Adm. Richard E. Byrd and his many associates. A heritage such as this should not be lightly tossed away.

It was in recognition of the signal services of this gallant American, Adm. Richard E. Byrd, to his country that I introduced legislation in the House in both 1956 and 1957 for the establishment of the Richard E. Byrd Antarctic Commission. Similar legislation has been introduced in the House this year by Congressman ZABLOCKI, and it has my wholehearted support.

Let me add that my association with this problem is not a new one. It goes back over several years. Admiral Byrd was my personal friend. I knew him personally before I knew his brother, Senator HARRY E. BYRD, who sits in this body with us. I talked with him many times about Antarctica, and I am perfectly sure that if Admiral Byrd were here today he would be against this treaty, because it sacrifices and gives away the fruits of a lifetime of labor so far as he was concerned, and the heroic efforts of the men who joined with him, many of whom lost their lives in establishing American claims and American sovereignty in Antarctica.

Under this legislation the Commission would bring together in a central depository all of the records relating to Antarctica, coordinate and supervise experiments, research, and expeditions of a nonmilitary character in Antarctica, publish scientific, technical, and general information about that continent, and in general take action to promote the increase and diffusion of knowledge of the Antarctic region.

Much to my surprise I find that there is no one place now where we can find all the data with reference to America's claims in Antarctica. They are scattered in the archives and throughout the histories of the trips made by Admiral Byrd.

In the legislation which I introduced was the provision that the Commission should also assist and advise in the establishment of territorial claims to the Antarctic by the United States. This feature is missing from Congressman ZABLOCKI's bill, and in my view, should be restored to it.

In addition to the basis established for U.S. sovereignty by Admiral Byrd and his associates, by Lincoln Ellsworth, and others, additional markers laying the basis for U.S. claims were planted during the postwar Antarctic expeditions undertaken prior to the International Geophysical Year of 1957–58. Instructions for these expeditions called for the extension and consolidation of U.S. sovereignty "the largest practicable area of the Antarctic Continent." By these activities the groundwork has been laid for the United States to assert its sovereignty. All that has been lacking is the official action on the part of the government which would solidify the claims.

Icebreakers were used successfully to carve a path through the pack ice. Aircraft tenders and seaplanes were used to photograph large areas never before seen. As Admiral Byrd anticipated, with the use of seaplanes and transport aircraft, Operation Highjump discovered more of Antarctica than all previous expeditions combined. It mapped an area more than half the size of the United States; discovered or confirmed more than 5,400 miles of coastline; and found and charted 10 new mountains, plus archipelagoes, seas, and ice-free regions.

When in 1952 the International Council of Scientific Unions appointed a special committee for the International Geophysical Year, Admiral Byrd advocated another, American Antarctic expedition, saying:

> We've led the world so far. We certainly should make one more effort to pave the way for the International Geophysical Year.

Subsequently, in 1955, Admiral Byrd was designated by President Eisenhower as Officer in Charge of U.S. Antarctic programs and led the first overall phases of Operation Deep Freeze. In this capacity, at the age of 66, Admiral Byrd made his last trip to Antarctica.

One of the features of the U.S. Antarctic programs included survey and photographic flights over large areas of Antarctica. These flights were made from bay ice, not airstrips. They were made without benefit of known landmarks or radio beacon landing aids, and they were made over areas never before seen by human eyes. They were made by U.S. Navy pilots who realized that if they had to ditch, it might mean a 1,200-mile hike back to base—over unknown mountains, treacherous chasms in the ice, in subzero temperatures and against howling winds.

These extraordinary flights, planes, and their courageous crews carried on the tradition of Admiral Byrd. They flew 23,000 miles—from McMurdo Sound on Antarctica's Ross Sea over the South Pole, the South Magnetic Pole, the South Geomagnetic Pole, and over the Pole of Inaccessibility. The Navy's cameras photographed a million miles of virgin territory. One flight crossed from the Ross Sea to the Weddell Sea via the South Pole.

Soon after his return from the first phase of Operation Deep Freeze, Admiral Byrd, already holder of the Congressional Medal of Honor and the Legion of Merit, was awarded the Medal of Freedom. A short while later, on March 11, 1957, he died in his sleep. His accomplishments in the Antarctic had aroused the interest of people throughout the world. He had the vision to apply modern machines and methods of communications. He trained and inspired hundreds of men to carry on the work he began. For example, when Admiral Byrd died the news was radioed to the South Pole where a group of men were spending the winter for the first time. In charge of the crew at the South Pole was Paul Siple, who had been the Eagle Scout chosen to accompany one of the early Byrd expeditions more than 20 years before.

LOSS OF OPPORTUNITY TO MAKE TERRITORIAL CLAIMS

If the Antarctic Treaty comes into effect, the United States will be giving up, for all practical purposes, the opportunity to make official claims to that part of Antarctica in which it has earned territorial sovereignty. The treaty explicitly provides that no new claims may be asserted as long as it is in effect. By this provision the United States makes a sacrifice much larger than that of any of the other signatory states, for it is the only country already with a strong basis for substantial claims which has not made those claims.

The proponents of the treaty argue that no nation will be giving up anything, since the treaty also provides that claims, rights to claims, and recognitions of claims are "frozen" as they now exist for the duration of the treaty. Since the United States has made no claims, we will have no claims frozen. Whether under the terms of the treaty we would be able to make claims later is a matter which is certainly subject to conjecture. I suppose this is true in theory, because the treaty states that nothing in it shall be interpreted as a renunciation of previously asserted rights of or claims to territorial sovereignty or a renunciation or diminution of any basis of claim. In spite of these provisions, however, it is only realistic to recognize that once the treaty comes into force it is very unlikely the United States will ever gain any benefit from its preeminent role in the opening up of Antarctica. How stale will those claims be after 35 years, or perhaps half a century?

In the first place, the whole purpose of the treaty is to extinguish national claims once and for all. It seems apparent from what information has been made public about the negotiations for the treaty that the clause "freezing" the status of claims was adopted primarily for the purpose of making the treaty palatable to states which have already asserted claims. The treaty has no termination date and seems designed to stay in effect indefinitely. As long as it remains in force, the entire continent would be under international control. Thus the treaty is really permanent in nature although the provisions "freezing" sovereign rights give the impression that at some future date the treaty will expire and the status of claims will fall back into the same pattern which exists today.

I assert that even the claims which have been made will never fall back into the same status as exists today, not to speak of American claims which have not been made, because after a lapse of 35 years or half a century—whenever this treaty might terminate—it is inconceivable that nations which have gone into that area, exercised rights, and asserted their sovereignty, as we can expect the Soviet Union to do, will not go back 35 years or half a century and say, "Let us adjudicate the claims on the basis of the situation which existed 35 years or a half a century before." It is not realistic to suppose that that will ever happen.

Second, even if the treaty were unsuccessful in its objective of bringing about permanent internationalization, it is extremely unlikely that U.S. rights in the unclaimed area would ever again be as predominant and undisputed as they are now. The countries such as the Soviet Union which have been given a voice in the control of Antarctica by this treaty will not readily pack up and go home if the treaty comes to an end. Meanwhile, the claims problem will have become more difficult as more and more countries undertake activities.

Again the treaty has a provision to hide this danger. It states that no activities taking place during the treaty period shall constitute a basis for asserting, supporting, or denying a claim. In practice, however, we can be fairly sure that if the treaty arrangement would eventually dissolve, new claims not now justified will be made. No nation, such as the Soviet Union, which establishes widespread operations during the treaty period will voluntarily abandon its facilities and wait for another country to assert or reassert a claim or rights of long ago.

In addition, where those countries have tenuous rights, they will use their activities during the treaty period to lend substance to rights which theretofore had no substance whatsoever.

SOVIET FOOTHOLD STRENGTHENED BY THE TREATY

Let me deal now with the subject of the Soviet foothold which will be strengthened by the treaty.

Just as political advantages will be given up by the United States in the treaty, they will be gained by the Soviet Union. For more than a century and a quarter prior to the preparations for the International Geophysical Year the Soviet Union had not undertaken activities in the Antarctic. Their activities had ended after 1821 when Adm. Thaddeus von Bellingshausen circumnavigated Antarctica and discovered certain islands in the area. Incidentally, he made no assertions whatsoever in any report he ever filed that he had sighted the Antarctic Continent. Under the treaty, however, the Soviet Union will have just as large a voice in the affairs of the continent as the United States. For all its activities, the United States will have no more rights in the area than the Soviet Union as long as the treaty lasts.

That is why I said the treaty is trading a horse for a rabbit. As we say in the West, it is "letting the Soviet Union in on no pair."

For about a decade it has been apparent that the Soviet Union had awakened to the political, strategic, and economic potential of Antarctica. The Soviets had no doubt observed what had gone on in the Antarctic and Alaska regions.

After World War II when the Soviets looked southward to the Antarctic, they found that, in large part because of American policy in not making or recognizing any claims, the continent was still open to all comers.

One of the first indications of Soviet interest came after the United States in 1948 suggested informally to the seven claimant nations the discussion of territorial claims, with internationalization as the possible solution. This proposal, which was rejected, brought about assertions by the Soviet Union that it would not recognize any decision on a regime for Antarctica which was reached without Soviet participation. At that time the Soviet Union still had no expeditions in Antarctica and based its demand to participate in decisions concerning that continent on such inadequate grounds as the Bellingshausen expedition of so long ago.

The opportunity presented by the International Geophysical Year was quickly seized by the Soviets. Along with other participants in the IGY, they had been invited to occupy stations in Antarctica. When the conference to coordinate plans for IGY expeditions in Antarctica met in July 1955 in Paris, it was found that the scope of the Soviet expeditions would rival those of the United States and the United Kingdom. Although part of the IGY arrangement consisted of a gentleman's agreement that all activities undertaken were to be regarded as nonpolitical and hence of no value in making claims, we can be sure that the Soviet Union considered it an excellent opportunity to gain a foothold in the continent they had neglected for so long. With the end of the IGY, the Soviets have made clear their intention to stay in the Antarctic with the maintenance of bases, additional explorations, and large-scale mapping activities. The Antarctic Treaty makes it easy for the Soviets to turn their brief visit into a permanent residence.

STRATEGIC CONSIDERATIONS

The presence of the Soviet Union in Antarctica which is insured by the treaty is more than an extension of the Soviet Union's political power at the cost of the United States. It is also a threat to the security of the United States and other free world nations, which is not mitigated by the demilitarization provisions of the treaty. These provisions will prevent the United States and other free world nations from erecting defenses on the continent. It is doubtful that they would be able to prevent the Soviet Union from making preparations to utilize Antarctica for military purposes if the Soviets were bent on war.

Antarctica's strategic importance for the defense of the free world stems from its heartlike position in the Southern Hemisphere, its location in relation to interoceanic shipping, its advantageous position for observing and conducting space activities, and, finally, its vastness and inaccessibility which would facilitate the concealment of dangerous activities.

In Soviet hands, Antarctica would provide a central base for Communist operations in the Southern Hemisphere. Our allies in South America, Australia, New Zealand, and other countries would have just cause for alarm in such a situation.

Even in past wars, Antarctica has proved to be a military advantage to an enemy. During World War I, German raiders operated very successfully from antarctic waters against Allied shipping, sinking or capturing several hundred thousand tons of shipping. The first U.S. vessel to be sunk in the war, the City of Rayville, was lost as a result of German mines laid in Australian waters. The Germans mined the ports of Sydney, Melbourne, Adelaide, and Hobart, and captured a substantial part of the Norwegian whaling fleet in antarctic waters. To keep shipping routes open in two World Wars, three major fleet actions were fought by the British squadron based at Port Stanley in the Falkland Islands. In a future war, if the Panama Canal or the Suez Canal were closed, Allied shipping would be detoured into the southern oceans, around Cape Horn, the Cape of Good Hope, or Australia. Whoever controlled Antarctica would have a great asset in the control of these vital southern shipping routes, especially from Antarctica-based aircraft.

With the advent of the space age, Antarctica is bound to have new potentialities from a strategic point of view. Antarctica, from a scientific standpoint of launching and observation of space satellites, is recognized as among the best adapted areas on the globe, because of the location with respect to outer space. As the range of missiles increases, Antarctica increases in value as a missile launching site. It is particularly advantageous because of its isolation and remoteness. A considerable part of the retaliatory power of the nation attacked would have to be devoted to destroying such a base; yet, since the area has no population, these retaliatory bombings would cost the attacking nation very little.

Moreover, the 5½ to 6 million square miles of Antarctic territory offer extensive opportunities for concealing activities. In other more inhabited regions, regular intelligence methods, such as information derived from the inhabitants of an area, would supplement official inspection activities under any arms-control system. In Antarctica, however, even with the observation system permitted by the treaty, it seems very unlikely that thorough inspections of the type necessary to detect missile launching pads could be carried out.

Finally, much of the weather of the Southern Hemisphere is made in Antarctica. As the Soviets learn the secrets of weather control, a subject in which they have great interest, bases in Antarctica might facilitate their utilization of weather as a weapon. Fantastic as this may seem at present, it is a future possibility.

ECONOMIC CONSIDERATIONS: A LAND OF THE FUTURE

In spite of the political and strategic considerations involved, it would be shortsighted to think of Antarctica only in terms of present interests. Antarctica is a land of the future. Its potentialities are hidden by ice and snow. Nevertheless, we can be reasonably certain that in time modern science and technology will open up the continent to beneficial uses. For the United States to give up the sovereign rights it has earned in Antarctica would be as great a folly as it would have been many years ago to forgo the purchase of Alaska.

The amount of natural resources in Antarctica is still a subject of study. Already, however, traces of some 175 minerals have been found, including manganese, copper, lead, nickel, and uranium. It is believed it may contain one of the most extensive coalfields in the world. To be sure, there are many problems to be solved before these resources can be extracted, but in an atomic age there is every reason to believe it can be done. As the resources in the rest of the world are depleted, the resources of Antarctica will increase in value.

One of the economic assets which perhaps will be utilized the soonest is its location on air routes in the Southern Hemisphere. Just as polar flights are already shortening travel distances in the Northern Hemisphere, they can also do this in the Southern Hemisphere. Transantarctic flights from Sydney to Buenos Aires or from New Zealand to Chile will sooner or later be scheduled routinely.

Looking even further into the future, Antarctica may hold greater benefits in store. For example, it is not inconceivable that Antarctica may some day help provide food for the world's rapidly growing population. The Antarctic seas abound in certain types of plant and animal life which scientists believe some day might be harvested.

Although the Antarctic Treaty provides for freedom of scientific investigation, it makes no mention of the logical aftermath of the scientific research, which would be economic development. This is a subject which is entirely omitted. Moreover, because the development of the Antarctic resources will require large amounts of funds, it is highly questionable whether Antarctic development will be undertaken, so long as the continent is under international control. A nation such as the United States could afford to make the necessary investments if it knew that the taxpayers who paid the bill were also to reap the benefits. However, America would be reluctant to invest for the benefit of the Soviet Government. Since the experience of the United Nations has shown that it is very difficult to obtain large amounts of funds for international projects, fears have been expressed that the economic development of Antarctica will be impeded by this treaty.

NUCLEAR EXPLOSIONS PROHIBITED

One particular provision of the treaty which should be viewed with caution relates to nuclear explosions. The treaty prohibits any nuclear explosions or the disposal of radioactive waste material in Antarctica. However, it adds that in the event of an international agreement concerning these matters, the rules established in such an agreement would be applied to Antarctica, provided all the Antarctic Treaty powers adhere to the nuclear treaty).

Since negotiations are going on now in Geneva for a nuclear-weapons test ban, it is possible that eventually the ban in Antarctica would be part of the worldwide test ban. But recent developments give us little hope that that will occur. Until that time, however, it may be a mistake to ban all nuclear explosions in Antarctica. In the first place, if tests are going to continue, Antarctica might be a better place to explode nuclear weapons than some previous sites. It is isolated from all centers of population, and residual radioactivity would not be as great a problem as in populated areas. In the second place, nuclear explosions for peaceful uses might have greater possibilities in Antarctica than anywhere else in the world. They might be used to open up harbors or melt the icecap. The Soviet Union has agreed, in principle, that under a worldwide test ban, nuclear explosions for peaceful purposes should be permitted. If such a treaty would not come into being, however, Antarctica would be denied the use of nuclear explosions, however beneficial and necessary they might be.

Similarly, the prohibition of the disposal in Antarctica of radioactive waste material could be very disadvantageous. Nuclear power may be the key to opening up Antarctica and developing its potentialities. Moreover, the prohibition of all radioactive waste disposal in Antarctica would add considerably to the initial and operational cost of nuclear powerplants on the continent.

Even for the sicentific projects of the near future, nuclear power could save the transportation of huge quantities of fuel. The flat prohibition of all disposal of radioactive waste material, a prohibition which does not exist in this country, should be carefully studied by those engaged in nuclear power projects, to make sure that it will not prevent the use of atomic energy for peaceful purposes in Antarctica or divert radioactive waste material to more harmful locations.

I recall the deep concern of the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. YARBOROUGH] about the disposal of radioactive material. I cannot think of a better place to put it than in the Antarctic region, rather than in some area closer to the populated centers of this earth.

CONCLUSIONS

In summary, the Antarctic Treaty is a setback for the United States in terms of its political, strategic, and economic interests. In practice, if not in theory, it will reduce the preeminent rights which the United States has in a large part of Antarctica. It will give the Soviet Union a position of equality which it does not deserve and which poses a danger to the security of the United States and its allies in the Southern Hemisphere.

One alleged return for these sacrifices is freedom of scientific investigation. This has always existed in Antarctica, anyway, for the nations willing to undertake the effort involved. The United States has always had the freedom of Antarctica for scientific and other investigations. Some have questioned why a treaty is necessary to establish this prerogative. Demilitarization, they indicate, is a poor concept. Practically all nations involved in Antarctic operations use the military in some manner to successfully conduct the operations, in that they—the military—are the only organized body with the equipment and trained personnel for many of the various operations involved. It would appear much better to have these military operations out in the open than concealed.

Another alleged gain is the settlement of a political problem by the freezing of national claims in favor of international control. It seems likely that if the international control ever ends and the claims thaw, they will be more complicated than ever before and certainly will not be restricted to free world nations, as they have been up to now. Proponents of the treaty point to the demilitarization of Antarctica as a step forward. In reality, it would appear to take what could have been an asset to the defense of the free world and, at best, neutralize it. At worst, the treaty would open Antartica to clandestine military operations by the Soviet Union. Thus, while the United States will gain very little from the treaty, it has a great deal to lose.

In fact, since the treaty applies only to the 12 signatories, the Soviet Union, through one of its satellites, could introduce military operations in the Antarctic region. The satellite would not be bound by the terms of the treaty. The United States would still be bound by the terms of the treaty, and could neither stop the military operations of the satellite, nor engage in even passive defense moves for itself.

These are the reasons why I have opposed, and still oppose, ratification of the treaty. I believe that it raises such serious questions regarding the interests of the United States and the loss of our established claims in that great area that, at an appropriate time during the proceedings, I propose to make a motion to postpone further action on this treaty until some time after the first of next year, when a new Secretary of State, a new Secretary of Defense, and a new President of the United States, whoever those gentlemen may be, and to whichever party they may belong, may have an opportunity to review the provisions of this treaty in the light of the best interests of the United States of America. Thereafter, and on their advice and in the light of their review, the Senate can proceed to the consideration of the ratification of this treaty.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Moss in the chair). The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McGEE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further proceedings under the quorum call be suspended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. McGEE. Mr. President, I rise this afternoon to speak in support of the Antarctic Treaty. I do so with full appreciation of the sincerity and the feelings of my distinguished colleague from California [Mr. ENGLE]. In fact, he expressed some of the misgivings which I myself once had on this treaty arrangement. But I must confess that my own feelings have been relieved largely by careful study of the treaty relationships which are anticipated in this document.

It was my privilege during the final negotiations of the Antarctic Treaty to represent the Senate as a member of the United States delegation negotiating the treaty. It is as a result of the combined factors of careful study of the terms of the treaty and personal knowledge of what went into the deliberations which led to the signing of the treaty, that I was persuaded to change my mind. The doubts that once existed in my mind have been resolved.

I am now deeply convinced that it would be in the best interests of my country for the Senate to ratify this treaty.

At the outset, let me suggest that there are two basic, hard facts of life which we must face, this memorable August week of 1960, in evaluating the true national interest of the United States in this treaty discussion. These facts have nothing to do with what one might have wished 20 years ago, or with what one would wish he could do if he were in control of the great forces loose in the world. These two facts are paramount in weighing what is reasonably and rationally possible in the best interests of our country.

The first fact is that, until now, rightly or wrongly, wisely or foolishly, for whatever reason, our country has made no territorial claims in the Antarctic. As of this moment, we have no official claims there.

The second hard fact, whether we like it or not—whether it might have been otherwise or not—is that the Russians are already in the Antarctic. This poses for us an entirely different set of alternatives from those we would face if we were starting from scratch, or if we could do it all differently. It seems to me we are compelled to live with reality, rather than in accord with wishes or with sheer fiction.

While we have made no claims whatsoever in this area, some of our friends have. In fact, seven nations have. The only position taken by our Government is that we do not accept these rival claims. Thus we have kept wide open our position in that area of the world.

I hasten to add, Mr. President, that this is precisely the position taken by the Soviet Union. Again, for whatever reason, we find ourselves on similar footing in that part of the world.

In addition to the absence of any official American claims to the region now, we have the presence of the Russians in the region now. This is not a matter for our decision. It is not a question of whether we tell the Russians they cannot go there. It is not a matter of asserting our own sovereignty and telling the Russians to keep out. Rather, we are pinned down to a much narrower range of alternatives. The Russians are there; what can we do about it?

In my judgment, we have open to us, as a sovereign nation, the right by sheer force to push our friends out of the way and to threaten the Russians by telling them to "get out or else," provided that we of the United States are prepared to risk the "or else" in the Antarctic.

What I have to say in regard to the treaty is learned in a firsthand manner from the negotiations themselves, and I say it with a true purpose of examining into the question of where we should best and most wisely try to go and of how we should most effectively seek to get there, in regard to our interest in this part of the world.

In my judgment we should ratify the treaty because of the advantages which will accrue to us if we do.

The first reason for ratification is that the treaty, as it is now drawn, deals with one of the few areas of the world still empty of human habitation and still relatively free from national rivalries. This permits less emotional discussion of the best interests of all nations, and particularly of the best interests of our own Nation. The Antarctic still lies outside the power political rivalries of the Soviet Union and the United States.

In size the area of the Antarctic is equal to the United States of America plus Europe. Although most of the area has been uninhabitable until now, with modern techniques it is entirely possible that we may see a measure of human habitation in that area before long.

While the mineral resources of the area are known to be extensive, they are of very questionable value commercially because of the limitations of geography and climate. Once again, this raises a question with regard to the time factor. Before the competing, the rival, and the sometimes ruthless interests come out into the open and become full blown, there is time to deal objectively and unemotionally with an area of the globe with the best interests of ourselves and of the world as the central motivating force.

The second reason for supporting the Antarctic Treaty is that the treaty would best protect the interests of the United States in the Antarctic.

I mentioned a few moments ago that to date we have pressed no sovereign claims in the area, yet there are seven nations, in all, which have pressed such claims. These include allies of America: Argentina, Chile, the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand, France, and Norway. I repeat, these are our friends, not our foes.

Quite aside from the question of the validity of any of these claims, it is evident that the assertion by us of any claims in the region would run contrary to the claims of those countries, for there is relatively little area left in the Antarctic which is totally unclaimed.

As students of the question have long since pointed out, a small region is unclaimed. There is one area over which no claim of sovereignty has yet been asserted. It is known as Marie Byrd Land. A claim to sovereignty in this region might well be recognized without protest from the other claimants, but to claim only this limited area would inevitably diminish our rights in the other areas, because the contention to date by our country has been that we do not respect anybody's claim. The area is wide open. We are free to go anywhere in the Antarctic, and we use this right.

I submit, Mr. President, that if we were to file our claim in the only unclaimed area still available, we would run the risk of barring ourselves from vast regions of the Antarctic to which we now, by our own assertion, are entitled to go.

Furthermore, the assertion of a claim would tend to heighten competition and political rivalries in many parts of this area and would almost certainly provoke claims not now on the books. We would throw open the Antarctic to the possibility of a Balkanizing of this uninhabited part of the globe. In fact, we might drag the area into the power political struggles of the cold war. In my judgment, this would be unwise. In my opinion, it is also unnecessary.

A third advantage to the proposal I make for ratifying the Antarctic Treaty is leadership by our own example. We should remember that our example is of some importance these days. As the leader of the non-Communist world our every move not only is watched but also is studied and in many instances copied. We hope that our example serves as an inspiration to other people who would like to follow the kind of life which we have proved is worth living. We have an opportunity in this part of the world to take the lead in providing an example of cooperation with other countries, including the Soviet Union, at a moment in history when the hope for meaningful international cooperation has sunk to a new low.

This is important. It is important because we have an area in which we take no great risk in standing forward and upright with the kind of example which we have been telling the rest of the world is the only hope for peace in the long run. We should seize upon this opportunity, in my judgment, because of the minimum of risk and because of the maximum of effect in example.

All sides in the present contentious struggle around the world agree that the only hopeful alternative to nuclear war is through negotiation of international agreements, however tenuous they may appear to be, however hopeless they appear to be at any moment in our power political contest. There must be those, moreover, who feel that the present moment is not the propitious one in the light of the breakdown of the discussions at the recent summit meeting in Paris and the backwash of developments since then in other parts of the world. The present low level of public confidence in international negotiation makes it the more imperative, as I see it, that a try be made in this relatively low-risk area to restore some semblance of faith in international conversation, however slight those prospects may in fact be, and however relatively minor an area, in fact, of the power positions of the world are involved in the Antarctic.

The third advantage, then, is one of our being willing and able to suggest a profile of the kind of leader that the war-hating part of the world looks for and would like to emulate and would turn to willingly with trust for guidance if it could be done with honor.

A fourth reason which I submit for support of the 12-nation Antarctic Treaty is that the treaty would permit experimentation for the first time with a plan of demilitarization coupled with free inspection, in which both rival major parties in the cold war would be involved. The importance of this advantage would be difficult to exaggerate in the light of what has developed in very recent years in the field of nuclear capacity on both sides, and in terms of the power of man to determine his own capabilities for survival. Statesmen of many nations and leaders of both political parties in our country have addressed themselves tirelessly to the problem of an international inspection system as the only reasonable and rational alternative to a reckless nuclear race, a nuclear race that could accidentally throw us into the destructibility of total war.

International despair to date over the lack of progress in these endeavors, despair stemming from a succession of meetings in Geneva, for example, now casts a heavy pall over the atmosphere of our world. In the Antarctic, under the terms of the proposed treaty, it may be possible to work out a formula for demilitarization and free inspection which might offer some guidance elsewhere in the world.

I recall that when I used to teach diplomatic history, the history of the foreign relations of the United States, I pointed up another milestone in our own country's history. In 1857 we drafted a boundary treaty with Canada. It was the first instance in world politics in which a frontier which was totally unmarked geographically was accepted as an international boundary line between two vast empires. It was possible because in 1857 the boundary lines between the Lake of the Woods in northern Minnesota and the Pacific Northwest in the United States were largely uninhabited.

The statesmen in our two countries, Canada and the United States, had the vision and the courage to try to freeze a boundary line before the economics of settlement and the emotionalism of national concern could distort and twist the issues. The result was an example of farsighted statesmanship on both sides. I think of that always when I think of the course that is available to us in the Antarctic, because here we have an area, the future of which is as yet untwisted by the forces of nationalism and the forces of bias, jealousy, and fear.

Understandable concern has been expressed about the role of the Soviet Union in these negotiations. I must say that I, too, as a member of the delegation, had that concern as we confronted the Russians during the discussions. A few simple facts, it seems to me, need to be laid clearly before us in assessing what it is the Russians can or cannot do in the Antarctic with or without the treaty.

The common position of the Soviet Union and the United States with regard to the policy of nonrecognition down there has already been alluded to. Neither one of us recognizes the sovereign claims of any other power in the region. Both of us assert the right to go anywhere in that area of the world. To be sure, the Soviets are Johnny-come-latelys. We have been there much longer than they in terms of our exploratory missions, in terms of our manifested concerns. But the harsh fact still remains that our position in the eyes of the rest of the world is the same, whether we like it or not.

This is the fact alluded to earlier, which we must face up to. The Soviets initiated their scientific activities down there as recently as 1956 in preparation for the International Geophysical Year. In that year they set up their basic station, which, incidentally, is located in that part of the Antarctica claimed by Australia; one of the signatories to this pact. The Soviets did not ask anybody's permission to go to the Antarctic because their position is the same as ours. They do not have to ask. Least of all did the Soviets discuss with us whether they ought to be admitted down there. But the fact remains that they are there, whether we like it or not.

The charge is sometimes made—and it was repeated here this afternoon—that this treaty "invites the Soviet Union into Antarctica."

That simply is not true. It is important that we set the facts straight.

The Soviets not only have maintained their presence there since their scientific station was opened in 1956, but they have conducted scientific activities there without interruption ever since. So far they have given no indication of packing up and going home. The only way I know of changing that picture, if they are not about to go home, is for us to send whatever force we regard as superior to the Antarctic to throw them out bodily, with all that implies.

I am tempted to inquire how many critics of the treaty would vote for such a plan. I say to the critics of this treaty, "Let us now be prepared to put up or shut up on the question of what happens to the Soviet Union in Antarctica." They are there. I ask the critics, "Do you now propose that we muster a military force of sufficient size to throw them out bodily, or must we find some way of controlling the fact that they are there, and work out a program which more nearly equates with our national interests and with the risks of our position all around the world; not just in the Antarctic?"

Another charge which is made in this discussion is that the treaty "admits the Soviets to Antarctica on an equal footing."

The fallacy of this argument is obvious. It implies, wrongly, that without the treaty they would somehow be there only on an unequal footing, or that they would not have the same footing that we have there.

Without the treaty the Soviets have acquired exactly the same position that we have asserted ourselves all these years, for better or for worse. There is no element in the treaty that has changed that position in any respect. It might be more desirable if the Soviets were not in Antarctica. Perhaps if we wish hard enough they will disappear from the face of the earth, and we can formulate our policy on the basis of that assumption. This is implicit in the argument in opposition to the treaty on the ground that somehow the treaty prejudices our position vis-a-vis the Reds in that part of the world.

The harsh fact remains that, treaty or no treaty, they are there. Apparently they are going to stay there, and they are not about to go away.

In the light of our position, the treaty does not give the Russians any greater right of access to the Antarctic than they have asserted on their own, that they have emphasized by their own action in moving in. On the contrary—and this is very important, because it is one of the bases for supporting the treaty—the treaty imposes restrictions on the activities of every signatory power, including Russia. Without the treaty there are no restrictions upon the Reds, short of whatever power the United States is willing to muster to throw them out. If we are not willing to do that, we have only the alternative under which we can supervise and restrain and restrict their activities in this part of the world. By the terms of the treaty, when it becomes effective, the Soviets will be committed by treaty exclusively to peaceful activities in the Antarctic.

This commitment does not stand alone. It is complemented by an unprecedented system of inspection of the kind which we would be happy to establish by agreement in other areas of the globe for even broader purposes.

The United States, through its observers, will have the right to enter at any time any station, any ship, any installation, any units placed there under any circumstances by the Russians.

The Soviets are likewise committed not to set off any atomic explosions in Antarctica, not to assert any claims, and to exert efforts in order that no one engages in activities in Antarctica contrary to the treaty.

Let us bear in mind how important these restrictions are, and how important is the system of control which this treaty would create, especially in view of our allies who are involved in it with us. Antarctica is only some 450 miles from the southern tip of South America, and roughly 2,000 miles from the countries down under, as we call them—Australia and New Zealand.

There are understandable misgivings, given our singeing experiences in some of the chapters of the cold war, and these misgivings center upon two issues. The first is: Is the United States surrendering an area of primary interest? Are we giving up that which we already have?

The secondary question is: "Can we trust the Russians to live up to the terms of the treaty?"

In regard to the first question, whether we are giving up anything, I go back to the suggestion I made in opening my remarks, namely, that up to the present moment in our own history we have not asserted any claims in the region. We have only insisted upon one basic position, and that is that we recognize no one's claims, that the area is wide open for our use. The treaty in its terms guarantees that all existing claims remain unaffected. Under no conditions can the treaty be interpreted as strengthening claims, as abolishing claims, or as abandoning claims.

What it means is that the treaty freezes in status quo the precise position in which we now find ourselves so far as the Antarctic is concerned. It specifies that under the terms of the treaty, never can the signature of any power be used in any way to build future claims, to accentuate past claims, to derogate claims of others, or to assert in any limited way that which has not been done to date.

However, it simultaneously opens several opportunities. It opens the opportunity of expanding the areas of scientific inquiry, without serious risks to our national position. It carries with it the opportunity to try to strengthen the case of international agreements as a possible road toward an alternative to nuclear destruction. But more important than any of these, in my judgment, is the fact that it permits a trial run of a possible principle of demilitarization and disarmament.

I emphasize "possible," for only a fool is unmindful of the many pitfalls in any meaningful system of agreement for disarmament, given the tensions of the world in which we are seeking to survive.

Yet opening up even the barest possibility, it seems to me, is an important opportunity for any country which dares to assert its leadership in the interest of a more peaceful existence among peoples. Thus, basically, at no risk to our national interest—for we have almost nothing on the line—we open up an opportunity for some gain. So much, then, for the stake of the United States.

What are we giving up? We have nothing there, to date, to give up. But we have a number of interests there which might be placed in jeopardy. Let me turn, then, to the second misgiving.

Will the Russians live up to the treaty? Can we trust the Reds? I think the answer of history is that we do not have much reason for trusting them, and that there has not been any arrangement which we have not seen them tear up like a scrap of paper. So we could never be certain that they will honor their own signature on this new treaty arrangement. But the fact, once again, to which we must come back is that the Russians are already in the Antarctic, without a scrap of paper. They are there now. Our only hope is that we can surround them, for many advantageous reasons, with a scrap of paper—which we call a treaty—which carries with it a moral obligation in the eyes of the world to live up to an international commitment.

What advantage, fragmentary though it may be, does this represent? It simply means that as we stand now, we stand alone, if we should desire, at some moment, to throw the Reds out of the Antarctic. If the Russians ignore this treaty which they have signed; if they tear it up; we then have 10 additional treaty allies who stand with us on the rightness of our position, and we have strengthened our hand. In no sense have we weakened our position; and in the process of lawful treaty negotiations we have enhanced the stature of our own country; we have broadened the base of our international interests; and we have armed ourselves with friends and allies in the event that the worst should come to pass in that section of the world. This, then, is precisely what the treaty makes it possible for us to do. It puts us in the psychological, the propaganda, the international law, and the moral positions of being right without any risk of the consequences of making a bad judgment or a mistake. We stand already on the older ground, on the law of the jungle, for at present it is only the law of the jungle, the law of the Antarctic, the law of the survival of the fittest.

While times come in the lives of most nations to measure when the struggle for survival requires the use of force, the United States must weigh carefully whether the Antarctic is the place for such a showdown. Therefore, it seems to me that we gain by surrounding the Reds with restraints and restrictions in an area where they are already on the loose, and where we have no armament of our own, except whatever naked force we might be able to muster in that part of the world. That would raise serious question marks in terms of the effect on our relative defensive postures in other countries of the globe at simultaneous moments. In other words, rather than trading a horse for a rabbit, as the distinguished Senator from California [Mr. ENGLE] phrased it, we are really getting something out of nothing. We cannot beat that in a day like this. We cannot resist projecting on the question of the Antarctic the issue of the gain or the risk that may be there, and the question of the travail attendant thereto, against the backdrop of this special moment in human history. I mean the summer of 1960.

It is conceivable to me that a case might be built for a power thrust, where we might get there the "fustest with the mostest," grab off some chunk of territory down there, tell the rest of the world to go jump, and ask them what they are going to do about it.

That is the way power was used in the struggles of the Old World. That is the way empires were built in Africa and Asia in the early days. But the policy of imperialism in World War I, in this century, and of the Franco-Prussian War, of the past century, is a thing of the past. We live in a new era, an era which began with the explosion of a couple of bombs which the United States itself dropped. It has been driven home by the progress which has been made both by the Soviet Union and the United States in the realm of the nuclear capacity to destroy.

So I say to the Members of this body who may chance, sometime, to wade through these comments that we no longer can stand here and assert with gravity what we are to do in a remote section of the world until we first measure what we do against what it is likely to trigger and touch off in other vast regions of the globe.

We have at last come around, full play, to the simple fact of life which Christopher Columbus taught us, but which the slowness of man in his communications withheld from us for many centuries. That simple fact is that the world is round. We cannot go off in any direction without meeting ourselves coming back. The size of the globe has been so shrunken that no longer can we gain time because of geography. No longer can we gain space because of slow communications. The world which was once held up as a tremendous land and sea barrier to the movement of peoples has now been shrunken to the size of an orange. Everybody is getting in everybody else's hair. Nobody will change that, except to make the world smaller. At the pace we are moving, the earth will be the size of a ping pong ball before many more years have elapsed.

So as a result of the events which have occurred since the two World Wars, particularly when one views the destructive capabilities of the great powers, the alternatives open to us in the Antarctic are limited, indeed. Those limited alternatives are compounded by the unknown capabilities of a Communist China which lurks in the wings, and by the prospects, as nuclear scientists are now warning us, that some two dozen or more nations may, in their own right, acquire nuclear capabilities in the next few years.

The world is relatively simple right now. If we do not act wisely now, I daresay we will look backward, 10 years hence, and wish that we might return to this simple moment when there are but four great powers having nuclear capacity. Within 10 years or 20 years this number may have grown to 20 or 30, and then the problem of regulating and restricting the many nations and governments which can destroy their fellow men will be multiplied many times over.

My special plea at this moment is that we try to look ahead, instead of backward; that we try to weigh the opportunity, slight though it may be, to take a meaningful step in the Antarctic which might possibly cast a slight ray of light on the dark path ahead. In a world which is desperately groping for peace, a nation such as ours should be winning friends to help us lead on the road to peace. We have that opportunity now in the Antarctic where the minds of men are not frozen by habit, where our judgment has not yet been completely distorted by fear nor hardened by national claims. The treaty which is under consideration is the result of almost 2 years of informal and formal negotiations.

The treaty is based upon the initiative of our country, and is an attempt to obtain international order in an area of the earth where none has heretofore existed.

In the international situation which now exists, there could hardly be quarrel with the simple truth that, somehow, the United States must succeed in maintaining its position of leadership. We must demonstrate that there is a way to live on the same globe with all peoples, short of destroying all peoples, including ourselves. Any other thesis would be absurd.

The Antarctic Treaty affords an opportunity to try out one of our chances. I daresay that the judgment of history would be harsh upon our country, if ever it could be shown that we failed to explore every reasonable opportunity. The price we have paid already for the chance that is ours to lead the world, somehow, short of war, ought to frighten us every night. The price we already have paid for that chance is a haunting one. We dare not fumble our chance, even in a relatively slight and—in the minds of some critics—most remote opportunity, such as the one we have here.

It is from virtually impossible situations, in which there are almost no visible chances of success, that great things have sometimes emerged. We are now in a position to put that kind of chance to the test by ratifying this treaty.

Having taken the lead as a country, we have a chance, by ratifying the treaty, to further that leadership. Already 5 of the 12 nations negotiating it have ratified it. Three of those ratifying it have deposited their ratifications with the U.S. Government, as stipulated by the treaty itself. This was done by the United Kingdom, on the first day of May; by the Union of South Africa, on June 21; and by Belgium, on July 26.

Two other countries—Japan and Norway—have informed us that ratification by them has been completed, and that they expect to deposit their official ratification with us in the very near future.

Mr. President, the chance we have will not wait for long. Psychologically, there is something that we call momentum. Spiritually, there is something that we call dedication and belief and faith that what one stands for is right. With a minimum of risk, we have a maximum of opportunity.

For these reasons, Mr. President, I urge this body, the Senate of the United States, to ratify the 12-nation Antarctic Treaty.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Moss in the chair). The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MOSS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCGEE in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

NEED FOR NATIONAL REASSESSMENT OF OUR PURPOSES AND GOALS

Mr. MOSS. Mr. President, the Salt Lake Tribune chose July 4 to carry a searching editorial on the need for a national reassessment of our purposes and goals. Because I feel this editorial should have widespread distribution, I ask unanimous consent that it be carried in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The editorial makes an excellent case for the importance of fresh energy and vision in our national leadership. Shifting loyalties and swift moving events have more intimately tied America's future with the futures of hundreds of millions of other human beings than at any other time in history. We have been jolted out of previously held views and courses of action. I am confident that if the American people are told straight from the shoulder of the immensity of the risks of not achieving the necessary national goals, they will respond with resolution and purpose.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Salt Lake City Tribune, July 4, 1960]

A DAY TO ASK OURSELVES QUESTIONS

This "glorious Fourth" finds some thoughtful Americans deeply concerned about the role of their country in the rapidly changing world.

The summit debacle, Khrushchev's rantings, mob action barring Mr. Eisenhower's visit to Japan, the outrages and insults of the pipsqueak Castro, fumbling and bumblings in Washington. These are not topics for happy contemplation on the birthday of our country, born and carried to greatness through a magnificent idea.

Politics-as-usual, the continued frantic quest for the pleasure grail, a general lack of direction and dedication—these, too, point to the need for a national reassessment.

Things could be much worse, of course. West Berlin is not under siege. Red China's threat is currently mainly verbal. Japan hasn't gone over to communism. America is making some progress on the scientific-defense front.

But the spirit of 1960 lacks the appeal, the dynamics and the promise of the spirit of 1776.

Henry Steele Commager reminds us that for a century and a half we have been living on the political capital piled up by the generation of the Founding Fathers and have added little to it. The U.S. revolutionary generation invented or perfected almost all of our major political institutions including the Federal system, the written Constitution, checks and balances, even the modern political party. The 20th century has contributed little compared with the great institutions of the past. The absence of statesmanship is a most conspicuous feature on our national landscape.

It is oversimplifying to say that industry and finance siphon off our country's best talent, that the rewards for public service are so shoddy that our most brilliant citizens avoid Government careers. Washington, Jefferson, Adams, Madison and a dozen others whose stature has been matched only once or twice in American history since their generation, were abused mercilessly by their critics and by each other. They had to cope with apathy, greed, ignorance and confusion.

The statesmanship and wisdom among the men who pledged their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor, and the decline of that statesmanship, are hard to explain, just as the explosions of genius in the Athens of Pericles, the Florence of Michelangelo, and the England of Shakespeare defy simple exposition.

One explanation is that talent and genius are infectious. So are mediocrity and indifference.

Albert Wohlstetter of the Rand Corp., who is paid for thinking for us, believes too much has been made of the frivolity and self-indulgence of the fat American public. "Soft American," pronounced with a foreign accent, has become a cutting and cynical term voiced by some of our own people.

Mr. Wohlstetter is convinced Americans would make a greater effort to achieve necessary goals if they really understood the seriousness of the risks of not making such an effort. He says the public was never less informed on matters directly affecting its life and death—that on the contrary it is assured at each crisis that no greater effort is required.

Not only do we lack statesmen of the '76 caliber, much of our best persuasive talent is engaged in selling body deodorants and such instead of ideas.

And a related weakness may be the efforts to sell ideas and political figures the same way that hucksters merchandise gadgets and sun lotion.

How can we recapture a sense of purpose and by our example more effectively inspire and enlighten? Not by taking to the open road in a high-powered car. Not by abusing our Congressmen. Not by overemphasizing our softness and ineptness to the point of defeatism.

We can ask ourselves what we are doing personally to deserve and protect the many advantages we have inherited from the democratic system. We can keep in mind that freedom will not survive just because it is a noble ideal. The preservation of a free society, the enrichment of the system of values upon which freedom depends, calls for high moral purpose and strong effort on all levels, in all fields. These cannot be safeguarded by either listlessness or hysteria.

TOURIST ATTRACTIONS OF UTAH

Mr. MOSS. Mr. President, Utah has long been proud of its designation as "The Center of Scenic America," and therefore as a tourist mecca. However, Utah has underdeveloped and undersold its greatest attraction, Great Salt Lake.

Utah's tourist business could be vastly increased if travel agents had a definite destination to sell. What more likely destination than Great Salt Lake, about which every schoolchild knows?

Utah's many recreation potentials, and particularly the Great Salt Lake potential, are admirably discussed in a talk entitled "Utah Needs a Tourist Destination," which was given some time ago by David M. Welling before the Advisory Committee of the Great Salt Lake diking project.

I ask unanimous consent to place the talk in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

At the conclusion of the talk, I also ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD an editorial from the Salt Lake Tribune of July 24 entitled "Bring on the Tourists!" and an article from the Deseret News and Telegram of July 30 entitled "Motoring Tourists Add Much to Utah Economy."

There being no objection, the address, editorial, and article were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UTAH NEEDS A TOURIST DESTINATION

(A talk given by David M. Welling before the advisory committee of the Great Salt Lake diking project)

As I have a travel business with offices in Salt Lake City and in Ogden, I have been very much interested in the tourist business and tourist efforts of the State of Utah for a period of years. While I was in the Navy in San Diego, we went fishing in the California water; we went duck hunting, and we used a lot of our free time to investigate the sports facilities of that country, and when I used to tell the boys, my fellow officers, what we had in Utah they just thought I was lying—how good the duck shooting was, how good the fishing was, and how good the deer hunting was, and how good the skiing was; they just thought I was lying. And so with their help during the last year I was in the Navy I formed a corporation. We called it Timberline Guest Ranches, Ltd., and about 10 veterans, when we came back from the war about 1946, started guest ranches to bring tourists from all over the United States, mainly sportsmen, into Utah. We started over in the Ben Lomond, here in Ogden, and we were working in the area of about 300 air miles from Ogden which cuts the heart out of the best sporting country in the world. It takes you to the Middle Fork of the Salmon River, Sun Valley, Little Fork of the Salmon River, West Yellowstone country, all the North Fork of the Snake, Yellowstone Park, Jackson Hole and the Tetons, on into the Wind River and then Utah's High Uintas and end up down in the La Salle area, Four Corners and Hovenweep National Monument, and all of that wonderful Monument Valley and Bear's Ears and the Colorado country down there.

Our purpose was to advertise, nationally, to get sportsmen to come into this area, to stay at ranchhouses which we would develop. We had a station wagon here in Ogden to pick them off a train and take them to Wyoming and turn them over to the ranch, and the ranch would take them on a pack trip back through the mountains for 5 or 10 days and we would pick them up and put them back on the train, and we would sell them their trip, all expenses, right out of Chicago. They really loved it. Everybody that came. I had a lot of millionaires and they really loved the service, everything that we did for them. But I couldn't understand why it didn't grow, why it wasn't bigger. It just seemed as long as we were trying to bring people into Utah we lost money; that is, we spent more money in advertising and promotion and everything than we could earn back. We were operating on a deficit that we couldn't afford to cover. And immediately as we turned around and bought the travel service and started taking people out of Utah, to Hawaii, Miami, the Carribbean, Europe, Alaska, wherever they wanted to go, as soon as we did that we started to make money. But we were never quite satisfied with the idea that we couldn't have Utah as a tourist attraction, and so I have written up this little bit of tourist analysis that I feel might be the summation of my feelings on what we should be trying to do in order to lure this tourist business to Utah. Now, I am also connected with the Associated Civic Clubs of Northern Utah and I am chairman of the committee on publicity and touring, so I feel that they have a vested interest in a plan such as this, also. However, I don't speak for that group; we are just talking about this idea a little bit today to get a reaction from it.

Utah wants more tourists. I think everybody in the State is sold on the idea that we want more tourists. We have talked to thousands of them because we are right close to Temple Square and we see the pattern of the tourist travel through the State of Utah. There are figures available on it. We are the crossroads of the West—the hub of the wheel. As long as there is a Denver and a Colorado Springs and as long as there is a Las Vegas and Los Angeles, and Hoover Dam and Grand Canyon, and as long as there is a Reno and San Francisco, and Sun Valley and Yellowstone Park, we will get as many tourists as we are getting now, if we do anything to deserve them or not. We can't stop them. As many as are coming now will come in spite of anything we can do, I feel sure.

We keep publishing the figure that a million people go through the Temple Grounds each year. We think that represents a tremendous tourist industry, and yet when you compare it with some of the figures of other entrances, it doesn't represent such an imposing figure. More people than that paid admission to the San Diego Zoo in 1 year. And so, as a nationwide tourist attraction we are not drawing and we are not keeping the number of people we should. We know that. And what we are doing now to get it is not changing the picture very much. Now, I am a very good friend of John Campbell, in fact we sent him from our office to the Governor to start a tourist and publicity bureau again. That kind of work is very important and will pay dividends in the years to come, even if the material that goes out from that office goes to school children, it is building Utah. But we are still a one-night stand. The people come into Las Vegas, Salt Lake, Yellowstone Park, Colorado Springs, Winnemucco. You can't stop them over. We have tried to get their efforts and hold them in our towns for an extra day, but, gentlemen, we can't ever hope to succeed in that because if you stop to think, this man has 15 days for his vacation; he has his trip all planned. He has to be in city No. 1 the first night, No. 2 the second night, No. 3 the third. If his car breaks down in Brigham City and holds him up 3 days he is really fouled up. He has got to change everything, or go back home, and his budget, time, everything, is all out of kilter. I have had enough experience building these trips for next July, in February when the man is sitting in his office, in his business, planning all of his itinerary, all of his days, all of his expenses, everything that he wants to do on his vacation. That is what we must do. We must sell this destination in Utah before the man leaves his hometown. He has to have enough time and enough means to stay with us.

Now, we have seen some fine destinations develop around Utah. Sun Valley is an A–No. 1 destination. It was built as a winter destination and has become a fine summer destination. We book to it all the time and we are sending wires for reservations all the time, sending people there. They didn't think when they built it that their summer business was going to be very much. We have had it happen in Utah. Some of our ski lifts that we built for the winter have become very popular in the summer. But Sun Valley is a destination. It has everything that you need to enjoy 2 weeks. If you don't go anywhere else but to Sun Valley you can have a wonderful vacation. It is meant to be just that. Sun Valley isn't happy if you want to check out in 2 or 3 days and go fishing over in the Middle Fork country. They want you to be right at Sun Valley; they want to provide the fish; they stock those streams very heavily right around camp so that everyone can stay in right close and have all of their meals, all of their lodging, all of their recreation, everything for their vacation at their destination.

Colorado Springs is one. Las Vegas has become a destination; since the war Las Vegas has become a destination. And yet we don't have a destination in Utah. I should qualify that because the southern Utah parks are a destination—one night in Bryce, one night in Zion, or they may not stop at Bryce, they may go to see Bryce on the way to Zion and then stop one night in Grand Canyon. And that's the usual weekend circle of the southern Utah parks for our people. Coming through, the other people have about the same pattern. That is about as long as it holds them. They don't stay at Bryce Canyon for 2 weeks. They just don't stay in there that long.

Now, how to build a tourist destination should be one of our main concerns, and how to handle these tourists as they set up their patterns. So many people will knock on the door of a motel in Ogden en route to Sun Valley, en route to Las Vegas, en route to Denver, en route to Yosemite, and some of the destinations in the west. And you have to be able to feed them and house them overnight and to service their cars and to provide for them. But you can't stop that kind of a customer. You can't stop him more than overnight.

For an example of that: We went into West Yellowstone or to Island Park and they had then incorporated 28 miles of road there so that they could get slot machines in all resorts. There are 17 resorts in that 28 miles. They have banded together into a resort association and they have started some advertising. They have given the Pocatello radio station $1,500 to go on the air with a program that would give away one free meal ticket in one of these resorts in Island Park if they would stop and have dinner with the whole family. Now, you see what I mean by not being able to change this road traffic very much. There's a radio program in Pocatello that is talking to the people who can't get out of going to Island Park; they can't go any other way; they've got to go through Island Park to get to Yellowstone. And they are just throwing their money away. Whereas, if they had bought $1,500 worth of advertising in a national magazine—Holiday or one of those national magazines—and had requests coming from all over the United States, it would pay them well. We did that in Sports Afield, in Outdoor Life, and Holiday magazine. We had requests come in answer to that advertising from as far away as Japan on the west and as far east as Europe. These people are asking for information on the accommodations and you can't take them into Monument Valley because you have no hotel there. You've got to have accommodations; you've got to have meal service; you've got to have recreational facilities; you've got to take care of all of their living needs in order to provide this destination. Well, this destination has to have facilities to stay (these are some of the things I think are important to create a destination); it has to have an interest level high enough to compete with everything that is in the world, Waikiki Beach, Miami, Caribbean, Sun Valley, Alaska, everything that's in the travel business; it's got to be good enough to take its share.

Disneyland was announced immediately as a destination. It requires a hotel; it requires special sightseeing services from Los Angeles, and it takes a lot of people out there and that's the key point of their trip; that's what they plan their trip for—to get to Disneyland.

A destination must be sold before the people leave home; that is, it must be well enough publicized so that the people can make reservations to it before they leave home. It must be impressive enough to generate more people to go. It should "snowball" a little every year. It must have facilities to play, and it must take advantage of all the natural facilities such as fishing, hunting, boating, swimming, and all of those things and the provided facilities, such as Sun Valley has done so well in providing, man-made facilities, any game that you want to play. Bowl, or arch, or fly-fish or trapshoot, or anything that you want is available at Sun Valley. They take advantage of both their natural facilities and everything they can provide. It should be large enough to handle convention groups. It is still Sun Valley's determination every year that they would not handle any convention group; they leave their whole facilities open to the tourists. Every year it is impossible for them to do it; they simply have to book conventions through the summer whether they want it or not, and they have to turn down thousands of people who want to go there because they are full.

This destination should be in the hands of all the travel agents in America. They should have brochures and rates. They are just 7,000 salesmen, located where the people live, that are answering the telephone, telling the people, "Yes, I can get you accommodations at Sun Valley. Yes, I can get you on a steamer for Bermuda. Yes, I can get you to Waikiki Beach. Wherever you want to go." It must be promoted nationwide.

Now, what natural thing does Utah have that we can develop into a destination like this? I think there are a few. I think that someday we will have a tremendous destination in Monument Valley, in the southeastern part of Utah. It will take a tremendous hotel there. I don't think the southern Utah parks are going to grow much more than they are, even though they are putting in more facilities there. I think that their travel pattern will remain the same. The skiing in Utah is going to get better and there's a new destination that we're starting to develop. Alta and Brighton, places where they have good hotels. We are bringing people from New York, keeping them for 2 whole weeks. That's the beginning of a destination. There is Snow Basin and others that have potentials, in the future, but when we look at the whole State and see what it is and we have those already world-renowned that we might use as recreation facilities to attract people to Utah as a destination, I think that the folks would come right down to this Antelope Island.

Now, the reason for my thinking is that it is big enough. I have always been opposed to the State owning anything it doesn't have to own, but on this sort of a thing I think that this should be a State park. I think it should be owned by the people of the State of Utah because I think it is too big for a private enterprise. I'll talk about that in just a second. But it's big now. It's big enough so that if we took the whole facilities and dedicated it to recreation to all of the people of Utah (we have nearly three-quarters of a million people in Utah) we could serve them well. Linn and myself have waded in the lake down to shoot ducks at the salt works there on the approach over to Antelope Island but there are many people who know about this lake but who can't play on it.

I think it has tremendous potential even from just Utah, from northern Utah, Cache Valley, here, and Salt Lake City and these other points without the tremendous interest that might come to it from outside the State. It has the shallow water on the east side, to facilitate road building from Salt Lake City and from Clearfield—those two roads would connect the metropolitan Utah. In the next 20 years Weber County, Box Elder County, Davis County, Salt Lake County and on into Utah County will be metropolitan Utah. It just has a tremendous number of people.

We haven't the land any more to put into golf courses. We haven't the land to have easy access to the bridle trail. We are pressed now to try to find places for recreational facilities. Antelope Island has deep salt water on the west side necessary for swimming, beaches, boating, etc. It has fresh water supplies which can be developed. It is already world famous. It is in every geography book; every kid who has gone through school in the last 50 years knows about Great Salt Lake. You would be surprised to see how many little sacks of salt on postcards are sold across from Temple Square to people to send away, advertising Great Salt Lake. Salt water taffy, little salt-bag postcards are very well known.

Antelope Island provides easy access to all the rest of the lake. Now, beyond Antelope Island is good sailing. I don't know how many people have had the pleasure of taking a sailboat ride on Great Salt Lake. I have one friend who was in this business with me on Timberline who built himself a wonderful sailboat and had it out at the Salt Lake County boat dock. It had a lead keel on it that was uncapsizable. We took it out sometimes when the wind was so strong that we couldn't keep the sail on it and we'd ride those big 8- and 10-foot waves. There's more recreation to be had by our people and visitors in this lake than anything else, than all the other things put together that we have in Utah, and we are not utilizing it at all as yet. There's a terrific thrill to be out on that lake. And the folks can take trips to the other islands. There's a boat trip I sell tickets to that goes around Manhattan Island. There's a sightseeing boat that goes from the Waikiki Beach down to Pearl Harbor. There are different boat trips under Niagara Falls that have become famous and I think that in the future you will see Greyline sightseeing boats leaving from this boat facility here that we are talking about by the beach out to Bird Island and we will have photographers from all over the world come to take pictures there on the lake.

Now, what should you put on the island to make it into a destination? It should have 1 or 2 miles of white sand beach with several dressing facilities all up and down the beach. That would serve thousands of people immediately so that if there were a road provided to deep water bathing facilities on the west side of that island it would provide recreational facilities for thousands of people in Utah. When I was down in Waikiki Beach they had just spent another million dollars to extend that beach about a hundred yards. All that white sand was hauled in there and dumped. That whole beach was built by man. A large hotel company has four hotels and there are another five or six involved and built up all around there.

When Henry Kaiser went down there (I took this out of Time magazine) in 1954 and bought a $187,000 beach home, his announced intention was to rest. While resting, he built a swimming pool beside his home in 6 days and suggested that the Government build an island. He wanted the Government to build an island off Waikiki and announced the plan to put $110 million in the new resort. Last week, Henry J. began to back his words with acts and after a quick trip to Los Angeles to line up financing, consult an architect, Welton Becket, and a representative of Conrad Hilton, Kaiser plunked down $491,000 for more beach front, thus became Waikiki's greatest landowner—16½ acres. Four hundred and ninety-one thousand for 16½ acres. Then Henry started taking bids for a 535-room hotel, 35 honeymoon cottages, each cottage with a private pool, 200 low-budget hotel rooms and 100 cabanas by his new beach site. If and when the Government builds Henry J. his island he will rent it from the Government and spend another $50 million there for hotels, an aquarium, convention halls, theater, even then he does not intend to rest. On the Koria coast 200 miles southeast of Waikiki he intends to spend $40 million for motels, hillside homes, fishing boats. Said he, "There is a need for more vacation facilities—a human need. When I was 22 I decided Florida would never develop in tourist business and passed up the chance to be on the ground floor there. Then I went on to figure that Palm Springs and Las Vegas were definite sand traps and always would be, and I don't want to miss the boat here." Henry Kaiser, in Time magazine.

Now, every bit of that and everything he is talking about in Palm Springs, and everything he is talking about in Las Vegas and Florida are man-built facilities for recreation. We can have it in Utah on this island. We should have boat docks and yacht harbors for small private craft and large cruiser craft because, there again, we can explore the whole lake. We should have sightseeing boats to other islands by Greyline on published, scheduled tours. These tours should be in the manual in the hands of every agent in the United States and they should sell tickets to them. We should have riding stables and miles of bridle trails; you have the whole island on which to ride. It should have two 18-hole golf courses to begin with. It should have a convention hall, capable of seating 5,000 people. It should have an aquarium. It should have an open-air wildlife park featuring all cloven-hoofed animals of the West in their natural state. I was managing a ranch at the base of the Grand Teton, one of the Rockefeller ranches, in 1946 and they started talking then about building this big new lodge up there. I stopped in last year at the end of their first season to meet the manager and talk with him about sending some people there, and he said that the lodge had had a million people walk into it. Now, they didn't stay there, not all of them stayed there, not all of them ate there while they stopped, but one million people walked into the Jackson Lake Lodge last summer. Now, there again is a comparison against the figure we keep bragging about, a million people coming to Utah and stopping at Temple Square. Temple Square is a much, much bigger attraction, should be a much, much bigger attraction than Jackson Lake Lodge.

When I was up there, too, they had built this wildlife park just a mile or two above the junction at Moran; the buffalo, the elk and all the cloven-hoofed animals are inside the big fence with cattle crossings there so that you can just drive right into the whole park. You have 39 head of buffalo out on Antelope Island and if we had a road out there today every school kid in the State would want to go out and see them. The problem would be to try to take care of the people. We should have a drive-in movie perhaps. We should have authentic restored western pioneer buildings. The Sons of the Utah Pioneers and the Daughters of the Utah Pioneers are looking for sites to put up an authentic western place such as have been built in Las Vegas and Elko and other places in the West. Virginia City, Nev., is selling the old western village. There, again, is a tremendous sightseeing attraction if it were restored and it could relive Utah history. It should have acres and acres of lawn and picnic facilities. It should have lots of facilities for tennis. It should have a championship-type horseshoe pitching course. It should have archery ranges, both stationary and movable, where they shoot a target and move (archery golf), where they shoot a target, move to the next one, shoot a target and move on. It should have trap and skeet ranges. It should have a stable. Now, this is all just dreaming, but they are things that we need.

We haven't said anything about facilities. I haven't talked to John Campbell for a long time about this. I was kidding him one day about it in the office in Salt Lake and I told him I thought we ought to build a road out to Antelope Island and he said, "Well, if we ever do, there's a fellow wants to build a $5 million hotel on it." I have never investigated that further, but the resort hotel, whether it would be private or State owned, or whether it would be leased to any organization, such as the Hotel Owners of Utah who banded together to build just one big hotel, or some such a thing, we've got to have facilities to keep people there. If you can keep them there you can offer them full recreational facilities of the whole lake. This can also be offered to all the people in Utah. I think it would attract a tremendous number of people.

It should have motels, as many as are needed to accommodate the traffic. It should have a trailer park to accommodate trailer traffic. Now, all this will take a lot of money and should take a lot of time.

When I was in the Navy in 1946, San Diego was worried that they were going to lose all the aircraft plants. The war was over and they were afraid that the thousands of people who had move to San Diego were going to be without a job. They went ahead with plans to turn 20 miles of swamp north of San Diego into a park. This was a make-work project to take up the slack of closing war industries. They planned it all out. They had it drawn just exactly how they wanted it. They had the parks all laid out; they had the landscaping selected; they had the roads, boat facilities, golf courses—everything planned to put there and laid out in this future plan. Nobody worried too much about how long it was going to take. They had it in reserve as an emergency measure to take up the slack for employment, something that they could build when things got tough. And they didn't wait. They went ahead and built it. Now they have a beautiful 20 miles of park there and it has terrific use. I think we've seen the day come already when the picnic sites in the canyons are gone and we have to pay 50 cents to park our car. Now, why wouldn't it be just as well, then, if we had a State recreational facility of this magnitude, to pay a dollar for our car and then have everything else free, once we get on the island? If we did that, and if we had the same kind of traffic we have clocked into Ogden Canyon on a summer afternoon, we would have enough money to make a wonderful thing out there.

The other costs I have no way of estimating. I'm not used to talking in figures like Henry Kaiser, but if it cost $25 million and took 25 years, we could work on it, one project at a time, all the way through. I figure as soon as something like this is announced to the people of Utah there would be a great movement to get it done. All the political campaigns for many years have been based on the idea that we want to do something about this tourist business. And yet they haven't done anything specific to really make a destination out of Utah. A man who gets hold of it and tries to put it through will get a tremendous amount of support from the people of Utah, I think.

I think we would have to provide a ways and means bill in the legislature to begin a park such as this. It would have to be approved by the legislature, this whole idea. It would probably require a commission to administer a park such as this unless there were already a State agency into which it would fit well. And we would have the problem of purchasing the island which I think shouldn't be too much of a problem because our recreational lands are diminishing. We are so close to so many people that some of these land uses are changing. We are in the midst of a change up in North Ogden; we want the mountain for watershed; we don't want it for sheep any more. It is too important for a watershed. And I think that a piece of land like this now becomes tremendously important for recreation. A roadbuilding program to open up the swimming and boating facilities should be first because the State is well equipped in the roadbuilding business and the amount of money that it would take isn't too great. And then it would immediately open up a great public area that thousands of people can enjoy. Now, Governor Lee has suggested spending $5 million on the lake down on the Magna side, just west of the Salt Lake County boat docks, to provide blacktop parking and clothes-changing facilities. That is a step in the right direction, but the only thing that it needed was to fulfill all these other requirements for a destination or it can't hold the people. You've got to hold them overnight. You've got to keep them there for several days. You should have some convention facilities there. It should be something between the idea of a State park and a terrific destination, something that can be world renowned. It has all the mystery and all the romance of the Great Salt Lake tied to it, and Antelope Island can become a great destination in the tourist business, I am sure. Eventually, they would have to solve the eating and living accommodations because they must be there in order to hold people. And then we could go ahead and build all the rest.

Now, there is one other point, and I don't expect you to agree with me on this. But I think the morality of Utah is such that this park should be policed as a very, very clean, wonderful, moral place, so that any bishop or any church minister could recommend to his flock that they do their playing on Antelope Island and go to Antelope Island for a picnic.

I think that if the administration of this kind of thing were similar to the administration of Yellowstone Park, if the beaches are clean, if the lifeguard facilities are good, if the morality of the place is kept high, and if it were a good clean place where any mother could allow her children to go, we'd have a terrific place for them, bigger than if we allowed them to drift over into something that was of a honky-tonk nature that people would be afraid of.

Well, gentlemen, I don't like to be thought of as a fool, but I had this in my briefcase for a long time before I even dared tell Linn about it, and it's such a fantastic thing that it's hard to present it without feeling that maybe it's just a dream. But I think that with our growth—we are going to double in 20 years in this area—and the recreational needs of the people, Antelope Island is a real project.

BRING ON THE TOURISTS

There aren't any surprises in a report just released by the State highway department on auto tourist travel in Utah. But the report does reemphasize some points which Utah's officials and people need to keep in mind.

One is the simple fact that tourism is big business—and increasingly big business—for Utah. The average per person outlay was found to be $22.93 a day. This covers the cost of transportation, food, lodging and miscellaneous items.

Some 12,000 tourists visit Utah every day at $22.93 a day each. This represents a great deal of income for a variety of Utah enterprises. And it must be remembered that the entire economy, not just motels, restaurants, service stations and stores, benefits indirectly from this added business.

The report also noted that nearly a fourth of the tourist visitors came from California. In summer particularly Utah is a natural tourist mecca for California vacationers anxious to see new country. We need to cultivate the California tourist potential—and not only in the summer, but all the year-round.

Over half the tourists got the idea to visit Utah from someone else, which emphasizes the importance of friendly, courteous treatment of all visitors so they will give favorable reports to friends and relatives.

There is nothing like word-of-mouth advertising to promote tourist business.

One last point. Utah is failing in the promotion of its major scenic attractions. The highway department count showed that out of some 32,000 tourists queried, only 3,775 had visited Zion National Park. It is important to get tourists to visit Utah. But it is more important to get them to take the time to really see the State. They will then enjoy their visit the more, and of course Utah will profit the more from their longer stay.

[From the Salt Lake City Deseret News and Telegram, July 30, 1960]

MOTORING TOURISTS ADD MUCH TO UTAH ECONOMY

Motoring tourists in Utah last year traveled 682,500,000 vehicle miles or 19 percent of the 1959 passenger car vehicle mileage in the State.

These figures were recently announced by the State highway department.

Tourists toured the State in 1,500,000 passenger vehicles and traveled an average of 455 miles in Utah or 207 miles a day.

The tourists traveling by auto in Utah purchased 48 million gallons of gasoline or 16.8 percent of the total State passenger car consumption.

These purchases brought the State $2,800,000 in gasoline tax revenue or 18.8 percent of the total gasoline tax revenue derived from passenger car use in Utah.

GREAT SALT LAKE NATIONAL PARK

Mr. MOSS. Mr. President, there exists in my State of Utah a lake which is unique among American lakes, and which possesses singular recreational, scientific, and scenic attraction. I am referring, of course, to Great Salt Lake, whose salt-embedded beaches, heavy, undulating waters, and windswept islands possess a strange, compelling beauty which haunts all who see them.

Because the area is unduplicated in any of our other national parks, and because, if even a portion of its shoreline is to be saved for the wonder and enjoyment of generations to come, it must be saved now, I have introduced a bill to set aside a portion of the lake as the Great Salt Lake National Park.

The fascination of the lake is well described in the magnificent book on it written by Dale L. Morgan. I quote him:

Visitors have called its waters bright emerald, grayish green and leaden gray; they have called them sapphire and turquoise and cobalt—and they have all been right. Its colors varies with the time of day, the state of the weather, the season of the year, the vantage point from which it is seen. It can lie immobile in its mountain setting like a vast, green light-filled mirror, or lashed by a sudden storm, rise wrathful in its bed to assault boats and its shoreline with smashing 4-foot waves. The wind is its only master. The wind drives it contemptuously about from one part to another of its shallow basin, piling up water here, exposing the naked lake floor there, as if the basin itself were twisted and tilted under the surging green brine.

Thousands of Americans have seen the lake from the windows of a pullman car as they crossed it on the Lucin Cutoff. This, Mr. Morgan holds, is to miss the lake's unimaginable glory and true splendor.

Walk the salt-encrusted beaches of the southeastern shore—and savor the sour, strange odor, half-stench yet alive and individual, that rises from the drying salt flats.

Watch the heavy, unquiet water seeking the beach, while with harsh, untiring outcries the gray-and-white winged gulls wheel above you. This is the holiday hour; children play along the beaches; an old man floats on his back before you, gently rising and falling in 6 inches of brine transparent about the rippling lake floor; girls sun themselves on the sand, and a boat with tall white sails is making for the boat harbor.

Behind you is the shoulder of the smoky Oquirrh's burnt umber and ocherous gray; in front of you, far out, is the deepening green water intercepted by a bank of deep, dark blue in which is set the low-lying gold and amethyst bulk of Antelope Island.

Then Mr. Morgan sums up the lure of the lake this way:

The feel of the sun and the salt on your skin, the wide sweep of the open sapphire sky, the strangely scented wind raucous with the screaming of the gulls, the intermingled beauty and striped ugliness of the lake and the shore * * * in all these things is something of the experience of Great Salt Lake.

During the three centuries of written history, the lake has been a magnet for all types of men. Spaniards, mountain explorers, and other adventurers sought it out. For years this strange body of water beckoned the intrepid and the fearless. Many expeditions charted and studied it. Later the Mormons found in it and in Great Salt Lake Valley their promised land.

During the years of the westward migrations, the lake and the blazing salt deserts to the west of it formed a barrier to the march to California, lengthening the trail by many miles. Those who tried to cross the salt desert directly lost their wagons, their animals, and sometimes their lives, and wrote tragic chapters in pioneer history.

Years later—in your time and mine—these salt flats came into their own as an internationally famous track for the great racing meets of the thirties, when world speed records were broken by Utah's own Ab Jenkins, England's Sir Malcolm Campbell, and others. The salt beds thus became a testing ground for better and safer cars.

The Great Salt Lake of today is only about 75 miles long and 50 miles wide. It is the remnant of a vast inland sea which once surged over most of western Utah, and sections of southern Idaho and eastern Nevada. This prehistoric lake was called Lake Bonneville, after one of the West's early explorers, and was the end of a 50,000 year geologic adventure, which left its markings on the surrounding mountains.

Great Salt Lake has three affluents, the Bear River, the Weber River, and the Jordan River, the latter flowing from a fresh water lake 30 miles to the south, and so named because of the similarity in geography to the Holy Land, where another Jordan River runs between the fresh water Sea of Galilee and the Dead Sea.

As every schoolboy knows, Great Salt Lake has no outlet and has evaporated to its present size during thousands of years. Its largest island is Antelope Island, 15½ miles long and 5½ miles wide, and encompassing about 23,000 acres. The island now can be reached by car over a sand bar.

Continuously inhabited since 1848, the year after the Mormons came to the valley, the island has wide areas of luxuriant bunch grass and fresh water springs which make it an ideal base for a cattle ranch. Since the early nineties, it has also been the home for a herd of buffalo.

It is Antelope Island which I would make the heart of the Great Salt Lake National Park. A rugged mountain range runs down the center of it, with peaks ranging in elevation from 500 to over 2,000 feet above the level of the lake, and with its highest peak 6,596 feet above sea level.

The ravines between the peaks are filled with gray-green sage, service berries, and willows, and, in season, with starch root, sunflowers, and wild roses. Mountain climbing and hiking would be a challenge, with a spectacular view in every direction.

The northwest side of the island slopes down to sandy beaches, where the water is clean and deep enough for both boating and swimming.

Fremont Island, a few miles north of Antelope, would also be a part of the proposed park. It is a rocky protuberance formerly called Castle Island. Five miles wide and two miles long, this island is covered with sage and greasewood, and with the addition of trails would be a suitable camping ground.

Construction of an improved highway across the lake bed would bring Antelope Island within a 30-minute drive from Salt Lake City. Thus Great Salt Lake Park would be easily accessible to the millions of Americans who come by car or bus into Salt Lake on one of the many transcontinental highways which have turned the city into the crossroads of the west, or by plane or train into this transportation center. There is no doubt that these tourists and many others would be anxious to make a trip to Utah's most widely known attraction, the Great Salt Lake.

To open up all sections of Antelope Island it would be necessary to build a highway completely circling it, approximately 36 miles. Recreational and dressing facilities would have to be built for the beach areas. A boat harbor would also be essential, with docks for private and excursion boats.

Other recreational facilities should include stables, rental horses, riding and hiking trails, observation points, an 18-hole golf course, a swimming pool, tennis courts, a clubhouse and associated facilities, archery ranges, skeet trap and small arms ranges, and primitive campsites for Boy Scouts, tourists, and hikers.

There should, of course, be permanent tourist-type motel accommodations, together with a grand lodge, dining rooms, and a ballroom.

The island would be an excellent place for a museum of geologic and natural history of the area and relics of early pioneer days.

The proposal would, of course, visualize an adequate supply of culinary water with a distributive system which would take the water to all organized recreational and camping areas and to other areas to support vegetation, and the construction of power and telephone lines so that all organized recreational areas would be adequately served.

The Antelope Island area of the lake would be made more attractive by the construction of dikes to develop a fresh water lake in the East Bay. Two dikes have long been contemplated—one from the north end of Antelope to Promontory Point, where the golden spike was driven to link the transcontinental railroad, and a second from Syracuse to the eastern shore of the island. Both would serve as a foundation for a road from the mainland.

The park, as I envision it now, would cut a section out of the lake approximately 8 miles wide and 28 miles long. It would not disturb the wildlife preserves around the shores of the lake or any of the present commercial operations which use the salt, chemicals, or other resources of the lake. All present and future mineral rights would be protected.

Unfortunately, there has never been any coordinated plan for the development and preservation of the natural phenomenon that is Great Salt Lake and the islands in it. Without coordinated supervision, the lake is rapidly becoming a dumping ground for industrial and municipal wastes, and a great and complex problem in which the interests of several State agencies, various Federal agencies, five counties, and numerous municipalities and industrial concerns are intimately involved.

Last year I asked the National Park Service to survey the lake and report to me on its potential as a national monument or park. The Service found it had:

First. Outstandingly significant scenic values, on which it commented:

> Here the story of the geological forces which sculptured the great basin and influenced its plants and animals is unfolded.

Second:

> Considerable scenic appeal, ranging from distant vistas of glistening salt flats to sweeping views of the snowcapped Wasatch Mountains.

Third. Recreational opportunities, the most attractive of which is the northern end of Antelope Island.

The Service survey took note of the extent to which the use of the lake as a dumping ground for wastes, together with its mismanagement, was cutting down its recreational potential.

Because these problems must be settled locally before an area of the lake could be set aside and saved for park purposes, I have scheduled hearings on my Great Salt Lake Park bill for Salt Lake City and Ogden for the middle of November. I hope the discussions will be sound and nonpartisan.

There is great interest in Utah in the feasibility of a national park on the Great Salt Lake. A recent poll I conducted showed public opinion 30 to 1 in favor of making a thorough investigation and study of the matter. Local civic clubs have passed resolutions in favor of the proposal and my mail indicates there is intense interest in it.

There is now pending before the Congress a measure known as the save-our-shorelines bill. I have conducted hearings on a number of the proposals to save various segments of our vanishing shorelines in widely separated areas of the country. I have found none of these areas to be more unique or more scenic than the portion of the shoreline of Great Salt Lake my bill proposes to save.

There is no doubt about the Nation's compeling need for more park and recreation land. The increasing standard of living, along with an increasing population and the broadened and intensified appreciation of the tonic values of hours or days spent in the great outdoors, have made it imperative that we acquire enough suitable land before it is too late. The National Park Service staff report to the Water Resources Committee, of which I am a member, shows that by 1980 the equivalent of 7 billion people will spend 1 day in our national parks each year, and that by the year 2000, the figure will have risen to 12½ billion. There will not even be elbow room for future generations along our seashores if we do not act now to save more of them. A portion of the shoreline of America's unique "dead sea" should most certainly be preserved and perpetuated.

In conclusion, I ask unanimous consent that two editorials carried recently in Salt Lake papers on my Great Salt Lake Park proposal be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Both are dated June 30. One is from the Salt Lake Tribune and the other from the Deseret News. These are two great daily newspapers in Salt Lake City, Utah.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Salt Lake Tribune, July 7, 1960]

LET'S KEEP GREAT SALT LAKE IN FOCUS

Senator Moss of Utah reports that 3,101 Utahans responded with "Yes" in his opinion poll in the State as to whether the study should be continued on the feasibility of a national park on the Great Salt Lake. One hundred and six replied negatively.

The Salt Lake Lions Club and other organizations have passed resolutions endorsing the study.

Senator Moss has a kind of open bill on file to create a national park or monument embracing a small part of the shoreline of the famed "dead sea." In its present form the bill would encompass Antelope and Fremont Islands, an area 8 miles wide and 28 miles long. The Senator has explained that his plan would in no way interfere with commercial or other exploitation of minerals and other resources elsewhere on the lake.

The need for additional recreational facilities near the rapidly growing Wasatch Front urban communities is well known.

The appalling Independence Day holiday auto toll, congestion in nearby canyons and the related threat to the safety of municipal water, and the fact that some 50,000 persons attended the Tribune-sponsored July 4 celebration at the fairgrounds, emphasize the need and the desire of many to celebrate close to home. Also, the fact that tourists generally stop only briefly in this area points up serious deficiencies.

A reconnaissance study of Great Salt Lake by National Park Service planning experts, made at the request of Senator Moss last summer, showed the potentialities and problems of establishing a clean and desirable recreational area on the lake shore. "Great Salt Lake illustrates outstandingly significant scientific values worthy of preservation and interpretation by either the Federal or State Government," the report said in part.

Antelope Island, the favored park site, and most of the other land adjoining Great Salt Lake is privately owned. As State Park Chairman Harold P. Fabian has commented, the State has pennies for recreational development, while the National Park Service has thousands of dollars. It would seem logical and wise—in the interest of Utah and the rest of the country—to do everything possible to encourage the National Park Service to make a more complete study.

Any recreational development at any location on Great Salt Lake will cost a great deal of money.

The Utah State Park Commission has committed $250,000 to buying a nucleus of a State park on the east side of the Wasatch Mountains and has taken options on adjoining land to cost about $1 million. There can be no question but that this project should have highest priority in Utah for State park developments. It is now or never for this "must" proposal.

Pressure to develop State facilities on Great Salt Lake in the immediate future could seriously jeopardize the Wasatch Mountain project. Those who argue that a small beginning could be made on Great Salt Lake—at Antelope Island—should remember that repeated small beginnings have been made locally for the last century. And most of the lake is today a notorious, smelly cesspool.

The National Park Service has no designs on Great Salt Lake. It is reluctant to establish even a historical site on its shores. It is ridiculous to argue that the Park Service would want control of the whole lake now or at any time in the future.

A hearing is scheduled for November on Senator Moss' park bill. It may be hoped that politics can be minimized by the time the Senate Interior Committee convenes in Salt Lake City and sound, well-considered opinion and information will be presented.

[From the Deseret News, June 30, 1960]

WHAT FUTURE FOR GREAT SALT LAKE?

Davis County officials and civic boosters are to be congratulated for their untiring efforts to educate the right people about the potentialities of Great Salt Lake as a great scenic and recreation area.

What is Utah to do with this unique, world-famous feature? That question has been debated inconclusively for half a century. The Davis County boosters are trying to bring it to a head with their trips to the lake's Antelope Island.

One alternative must be ruled out absolutely: We cannot allow the lake to remain in its present state. No geographical feature in the entire West is more widely known than the Great Salt Lake. Few, if any, have been the goal of more tourists. None has been as disappointing.

Virtually every first-time tourist to Utah puts a visit to and a swim in Great Salt Lake near the top of his "must" list. Many are dissuaded by unfavorable reports. Many others make the effort and come away disgusted by the combination of dismal facilities, bad odor, dirtiness, mosquitoes, and interminable wading through murky water and mud to reach a point deep enough to float. Utah simply cannot afford the kind of reputation these visitors are spreading about the State.

What, then, is to be done?

One approach has been undertaken by Senator FRANK E. Moss and others, to persuade Congress to create a national park out of part of the lake. Senator Moss has introduced a couple of bills, the latest of which would limit the park to the Promontory Point-Fremont Island-Antelope Island area and the water between. It includes language intended to protect the right of future development of the chemicals and other resources of the lake. It would also direct the Secretary of Interior to study the feasibility of building a dike to establish a fresh-water area on the east side of the lake—a dream held for generations.

Governor Clyde and others have properly raised questions about this proposal. Chief among them is the all-too-obvious fact that a reservation of rights made by one Congress or one administration might not be honored by a later one. Utah can hardly risk the right of future development of what is, among other things, perhaps the greatest chemical potential in the Western Hemisphere.

The other alternative is State and local development. The Davis County leaders believe they have devised a program within the capacity of the State to handle. Briefly, it would involve a dike from the mainland near Syracuse to the north end of Antelope Island, a road along the west side of the island and across the present dike at the south end, and development of recreation facilities at the north end of the island.

The two dikes would enclose a substantial bay that would gradually become fresh water.

Previous diking proposals have run into the objection of tremendous costs, since they would involve building long dikes in the deepest parts of the lake. The new proposal, by contrast, would involve only a 5.2-mile dike across what are now virtual mud flats.

Recreation facilities at the north end of Antelope Island would have tremendous advantages. The shoreline drops off rather sharply into water that is sparkling blue and clean. Beaches are of gleaming white sand. There is no odor, no drift rows of dead brine shrimp, few mosquitoes. The area is, in short, representative of the Great Salt Lake itself, not of a dismal meeting of lake and mainland.

A great many questions remain, of course. No thorough cost estimates have been made. Unless fresh water for drinking and landscaping can be obtained, development is impossible. Land acquisition is another question. A thorough study of the contour and nature of the offshore lake floor is needed.

If these factors prove favorable, perhaps the long-awaited development can go ahead at last. Certainly the study should proceed promptly.

Mr. MOSS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PROGRAM FOR TUESDAY

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I am informed that several Senators desire to speak tomorrow on the treaty. Because of the necessity for some committee meetings tomorrow morning, the Senate will not convene, under the order, until 12 o'clock. I hope that all Senators who desire to address themselves to the treaty will be prepared shortly after the Senate convenes, to make their remarks.

I should like to have the Senate remain in session late tomorrow evening, if that is possible, in order to reach a vote on the treaty tomorrow. Of course, so long as Senators desire to speak, under the rules they may speak. However, we should like to dispose of the treaty tomorrow, if possible.

I desire to have the RECORD show that all Senators should be on notice to have their speeches ready, if they care to address themselves to this subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the pleasure of the Senate?

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Citizens' Platform for 1960 Political Campaign

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 8, 1960

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, as we know, the major political parties—Democratic and Republican—created at their national conventions and presented to the American people party platforms for the 1960 election.

The platforms for the most part reflect what the parties propose or promise to do for the people.

We recognize, of course, that in many fields the Federal Government does have a fundamental and/or supplemental responsibility.

Naturally, each party wishes to—and, in fact, must—clarify what it proposes to do on major national issues, if it hopes for victory in November.

As citizens, however, I believe it is significant that—as provided by the Constitution—we reserve the responsibility and opportunity to do what we can for ourselves.

Among other things, this means retaining the rights, freedoms, and responsibilities, to stimulate the creative efforts and "test the mettle" of the American people.

In effect, we do not want to spoon feed our citizens with a ladle of bureaucracy, from the cradle to the grave.

Recently, I was privileged to outline proposals for a citizens platform for the 1960 campaign, in an address over Wisconsin radio stations. I ask unanimous consent to have excerpts from the address printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the excerpts from the address were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The major political parties—Republican and Democratic—have adopted platforms upon which to run in the 1960 elections. For the most part, however, these resolutions propose—or at least promise—what the parties would, if elected, do for the people.

About 100 years ago, however, Abraham Lincoln—in a now time-tested statement—said: "The legitimate object of government, is to do for a community of people, whatever they need to have done, but cannot do at all, or cannot so do well, for themselves—in their separate, and individual capacities."

As citizens, I believe that it is essential that we—the people—retain the maximum rights, freedom, and responsibility—to stimulate the creative potential and "test the mettle" of our people. What we do not want is to spoon feed our citizens by the ladle of bureaucracy from the cradle to the grave.

What, then, is the citizen's role—yours and mine—in this upcoming campaign?

BILL OF RIGHTS FOR VOTERS

Fundamentally, Mr. and Mrs. Voter have both rights and obligations.

In the campaign, we, as citizens, have a right:

1. To be presented with all the facts—not just "selected data" to prove allegations;

2. To expect candidates to "live up" to their campaign promises;

3. To a campaign debating the issues, not a mudslinging foray; and

4. Since we are living in a "glass house"—so to speak, with the world looking on—

we have a right to expect responsibility by candidates in public statements. Why? Because any such statements may provide propaganda ammunition in the Communist international ideological struggle. In these times, we are no longer an island unto ourselves. Consequently, we need a new "high road" of campaigning.

Today the American people are looking more closely at the qualifications and capabilities of candidates. Also, there is a growing trend—with some exceptions—away from the hard-and-fast "party line" voting. The voter who "thinks for himself" is a growing phenomenon. Overall, I believe this is a healthy sign in U.S. political life.

VOTERS' OBLIGATIONS

Now, let's look at voter obligation: These include:

First, to roll up our sleeves and work in the party of our choice;

Second, if we can, contribute. In the words of the popular slogan: "Don't pass the buck, instead, give a buck."

Third, be informed on the candidates, their qualifications, and the issues of the day; and Fourth, to vote.

The voting record by U.S. citizens is deplorably low—ranging from 24 percent in 1904 to 63 percent in 1952 in a national election.

By contrast, voting in other countries has reached such ranges as follows: Italy, 93 percent; Germany, 86 percent; Turkey, 87 percent; Denmark, 80 percent.

For 1960, the Nation should shoot for a minimum of 75 percent, and, if possible, a 90–100 percent voting record in the election.

Now, why is voting so necessary?

In a complex age, each of us, as citizens, faces the task of fulfilling a dual role: First, as an individual integrated into our social and economic structure; and second, as a civically responsible citizen in our political system.

Tragically, the voters of the country—historically—have demonstrated far too little interest in exercising their voices in government. Specifically, what does this really mean?

Loss of a voice in government—through negligence—for millions of people;

Rule of a minority, since the total vote at its top is barely over 50 percent of the population;

An inordinately strong voice in government for the special interests crusading for their own goals; and

A loss to the Government itself in terms of strength of support, ideas, efficiency, and organization of the nonvoting populace.

In general, the apathetic attitude toward voting results in "somebody minding our business.'" However, government is the business of each of us.

NEW LOOK AT CITIZEN'S ROLE IN ECONOMY

Over the years, the Government has assumed a larger and larger share of responsibility in a great many fields. Unless voluntary effort is undertaken by the people to handle as many programs as possible, it can be safely assumed that the long arm of Uncle Sam will reach farther into the affairs of our citizens. Again and again, it must be stressed that the success of a free society depends upon maintaining opportunity for the initiative, ingenuity, and enterprising spirit of its citizens.

Today, we live in a fast-changing world. Again, to paraphrase Lincoln: "In new times, we need to devise new programs." During this process, however, we must be careful not to forget the role of the individual and assign all new responsibilities to Uncle Sam. Instead, there needs to be every precaution taken to preserve—within an orderly society—the opoprtunity for the individual to make his unique contribution with a maximum degree of freedom.

What does this mean? Among other things:

A reevaluation of the individual versus governmental role in developing new programs.

A stronger, more active voice in Government for our citizens;

Surveying the gamut of programs to see how and where, individual effort and group, State, or county initiative can take the burden off Uncle Sam;

Adopting an "election year" resolution that candidates and parties—not just with "promises" of more Government aid, but with a "sense of responsibility," will merit—and get—our votes in November.

The lifeblood of a republic is its people—well informed, creative, thinking citizens.

To a large degree, progress in a free society depends upon the active participation of its citizens.

First, we must elect the right candidates to serve our country; and Second, following such election, we cannot adopt the attitude of "Well, we've elected him. Now let him do the job."

Instead, in these challenging times, we need a real mobilization of our national manpower and resources—on a voluntary basis—to assure an ever-better life for our citizens and establish peace on the globe.

Beaumont Enterprise Says No Reason for Putting Off Until Next Year Padre Island National Park Bill That Could Pass This Year

OF

HON. RALPH W. YARBOROUGH

OF TEXAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 8, 1960

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, although there is a great deal of vitally important legislation awaiting congressional action, I want again to urge action at this session on my proposal to establish a national seashore recreation area on Padre Island.

There are those who have taken the position that despite the fact that the bill is a sound, reasonable, and needed measure to preserve America's last, great open beach for public use, the proposed action should be put off until early next year.

Hundreds of thousands of Texans and many lovers of outdoors across the Nation believe that in this case we should not put off until next year what we can achieve this year. To begin with, it would be more costly to wait, because the same property will be more expensive with each passing year.

What is more, if we do not act this year, we shall run the very real risk of losing a very substantial part of the area to private development as part of America's fenced-off, vanishing shoreline.

Within the past few weeks, private property owners, under a new ruling they have gotten from the Supreme Court of Texas, have gone onto the beach and have driven railroad ties into the sands, to keep people from driving their cars up and down the beach—the first time since Europeans first gazed upon the shores of that part of the Western Hemisphere that those beaches have been fenced off and have been removed from use by the general public.

Mr. President, at the present time this land can be acquired for moderate amounts of money.

The Secretary of the Interior has recommended that the bill be passed and that the Federal Government spend $8 million on this badly needed recreational area, which will be 88 miles long—the last long section of available seashore on either of our costs. The administration, even though it is very money conscious, and slow as it has been to develop the resources and the recreational facilities of America, has in this instance said that this situation is so critical that it will spend $8 million for this purpose, over a period of 5 years, if the Congress will take action on it this year. However negligent the administration has been and however slow and misguided its "no new starts" policy has been, we cannot complain about its policy with respect to this badly needed recreational area. So it is up to the Congress to pass the measure at this session, and thus give the American people the opportunity to have this ocean beach area—suitable for both fishing and other recreational purposes—available the year around, for the benefit of all the people of the United States.

Recently the Beaumont Enterprise, one of Texas' most straightforward and responsible daily newspapers, editorialized on this subject. It pointed out there are some obstacles to passing the measure in this session at this time, but the paper calls for passage at the present time, because, with the passage of time, land that is available now may not be available later, and the cost will increase by millions and millions of dollars.

I am hopeful the Senate Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs will bring this bill up. Full hearings were held at Corpus Christi, in December of 1959. My senior colleague from Texas has written me that he was for this measure. With that combined support, this bill should become law.

I ask unanimous consent to have the editorial from the Wednesday, July 27, 1960, Beaumont Enterprise, entitled "Applause for Mr. YARBOROUGH," printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

APPLAUSE FOR MR. YARBOROUGH

Senator RALPH YARBOROUGH's staff says, reports the Dallas Morning News, the Senator will be pushing for passage of the Padre Island National Park bill when the Senate reconvenes on August 8.

Despite the fact that other so-called must measures are first in line, YARBOROUGH feels the bill has a good chance, the News report adds.

This is encouraging in that not only is Mr. YARBOROUGH continuing the fight for the Padre Island legislation—on which he has done a most admirable job—but also that the junior Senator continues to have confidence that Congress may pass the bill this year. Unfortunately, few Texans share Mr. YARBOROUGH'S confidence at this time. However, the Senator is in a better position than most of us to judge the chances of the measure.

It is to be hoped Senator YARBOROUGH'S hard work will pay off. But if it doesn't, it certainly won't be his fault. Texans can and should commend the Senator for what he has already done.

Boris Pasternak's Last Message to the World

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

Monday, August 8, 1960

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, in these days of history-changing international events, we are experiencing a rapid series of crises, almost in day-to-day succession. The temperature of the cold war goes up and down upon a thermometer of time. The East-West struggle goes on—consisting of charges and countercharges, proposals, and disagreements, threats, counterthreats.

The Western nations, I believe, despite the efforts of the Kremlin to divide us, the problem of strengthening our coalition, and the job of ironing out any differences between our countries, have done an admirable job of holding back the tide of communism and of serving the interests of peace.

In the face of diverse and sometimes fast-changing tactics of the Kremlin, however, we need to continue relentlessly to be prepared to stave off outspreading problems of the conspiracy, as well as to establish—as we can—more effective ways, not only of stopping the outspread of communism, but also of turning the tide in the other direction.

In this effort, we must ask ourselves: Are we really, day by day, understanding any better the scope of, and ways to deal with, the challenge?

Our Government, I am satisfied, is attempting to carry forward a wide variety of programs—within the limitations of manpower and money available—to do what it can, on a government-to-government basis.

But the question, I believe, also should be asked: Are we, the people—individually and together—going forward rapidly enough in our understanding of the Communist mind and purpose, and also of the heart and will of the Communist-dominated people?

Personally, I am convinced that even among the enslaved peoples behind the Iron and Bamboo Curtains, there is the universal will for peace, for a better life.

As it is possible, I believe that a greater effort must be made to extend our ingenuity and creativity toward finding ways in which we, the people, universally dedicated to peace, can find common grounds of understanding with those under the domination of communism.

Yesterday, This Week magazine published a thought-provoking interview by Jhan Robbins with Boris Pasternak, the late Russian poet, novelist, and Nobel Prize winner. In itself, the article is illuminating. More than that, however, it reaffirms what many of us have long believed—that is: The human will for peace, brotherhood and a better life, is universal—on both sides of the Iron and Bamboo Curtains; the spirit of man will not be satisfied with bread alone; the propaganda of atheistic, materialistic Communists is not supplanting the desire and yearning for peace in the hearts of the people whom they dominate.

To the contrary, the dictatorial, social, and economic philosophy of communism continues to frustrate and defeat the inherent God-given will and aspirations of people of all lands subject to its totalitarian reins. Because it fails to allow the soul of man opportunity to rise to its greatest heights, I am convinced that communism ultimately must fall—either from without or from within.

As published in This Week, the interview records that even under communism—designed to enslave body, mind and soul of man—the universal will for self-expression still strives to lift its voice.

I quote from the interview with Boris Pasternak: The question is, "Can a man control his future?"

Yes. Despite the system he lives under, I believe that men everywhere have more power over the future than ever before. The important thing is that we must choose to exercise it. It is conventional to say that the future belongs to our unborn children but the fact is it belongs to us. What we do today determines how the world shall go. Tomorrow is made up of the sum total of today's experiences. No one knows what the formula is, nor how slight a change may reshape the pattern to our heart's desire. Far from feeling hopeless or helpless, we must seize every opportunity, however small, to help the world around us toward peace, productivity and human brotherhood.

Appreciating the dramatic effect of Boris Pasternak's last message to the world, I believe, however, that the message of Boris Pasternak—symbolizing the courage of a human soul in the face of only God knows what pressures to still his voice—will live long in history.

I ask unanimous consent to have the interview printed at this point in the RECORD, along with excerpts from a recent address which I was privileged to make over Radio Liberty to people behind the Iron Curtain.

The purpose of the broadcast was to counter some of the propaganda which has been spread about U.S. activities, as well as again to reassure the Russian people that despite tirades of propaganda, we and our U.S. leaders are committed, not to war, not to imperialism—which is really the characteristic of communism—but to the establishment of a just and lasting peace in the world.

There being no objection, the article and the excerpts from the address were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From This Week magazine]

(By Jhan Robbins)

The recent death of Boris Pasternak released me from a pledge of secrecy he did not ask me to make, but which I made to myself. When I spent an afternoon with him last September I was, I believe, one of the last representatives of the non-Communist world to speak to him at length. When I came away I had the peculiar feeling that comes from spiritual and mental contact with one of those rare human beings who are born far ahead of their time. I was aware that in our talk he had made a stirring declaration to the world.

As a journalist I could not help but be tempted to file the story while I was still trembling with the impact. Just as strongly I knew that I could not. I had not come to him as a reporter. Our 4-hour talk was the kind that occurs between two people who meet, exchange views and feel at once that they can be friends. I did not want to write anything that would make life more difficult for this man who had already suffered so much.

Now Pasternak is dead. The man who refused the Nobel Prize for Literature on pain of exile can no longer be hurt by anyone. In America and in the countries of Western Europe, the news was received with shock and grief. To many the author of "Doctor Zhivago" was clearly a martyr in the worldwide struggle which is seeking to decide whether the rights of the individual shall be recognized ahead of the needs of the state. Details of his funeral were read by millions with a mixture of reverence and indignation. In his own country it is doubtful that very many people even knew of his passing. Most newspapers in the Soviet Union virtually ignored it.

Yet he was known and loved there, too. It is said that once when he merely mentioned that he was going to read some of his poetry on a certain Wednesday night in midwinter, nearly a thousand people tramped through bitter cold to hear him. They pushed so enthusiastically into the meeting hall that they broke a grandstand.

I, myself found him unforgettable. Although he must even then have been suffering from the cancer which killed him 8 months after I saw him, he had a sturdy, hard-looking body. He wore his silver hair in a rough thatch. As we talked I watched the dark, deep-set eyes blaze with conviction, cloud with pain and then suddenly sparkle with amusement. (I had just told him that my wife, who is also a writer, finds it relaxing to scrub floors. "Ah," he said, nodding, "I shall have to try that.")

As a Quaker, I went to see Boris Pasternak because members of the Religious Society of Friends were acutely aware of his anguish and my wife and I were asked to convey a private message of comfort and support.

Once in Moscow, however, when I mentioned Peredelkino, where Pasternak lived, our interpreter shook her pretty blond head and said firmly, "It is much too distant. Besides, there is nothing to see." My wife then asked to be taken on a tour of Moscow's colorful secondhand shops and I resorted to that international source of information, a taxi driver. "Peredelkino," I asked, "daleky (far)? Or blizky (near)?"

He grinned and answered, "blizky." I gave him a fistful of rubles and off we went. The trip, 25 minutes in length, took us to a sleepy suburb choked with white birch trees. Pasternak's two-story brown frame house was at the end of a long, narrow lane. On his door was a hand-lettered sign in Russian. I knocked.

Pasternak himself answered. His eyes swept over my American clothes. In perfect English he asked exasperatedly, "Didn't you read my sign?"

I replied that I understood only a smattering of Russian. He translated: "Journalists and others, please go away, I am busy."

I was overwhelmed with a sense of my own bad manners. I blurted out my message and began to stumble back down the steps. His face softened.

"Wait," he said. "Do you like poetry?"

Taken by surprise, I answered, "Some, yes. And some, no."

"Come in," he said. "Let's talk."

Three times, as the afternoon wore on, I thanked him for his hospitality and rose to go. Each time, he waved me back to my seat beside him at the large round dining table. Between us, we consumed three pots of strong tea sweetened with beet sugar. The house was quiet. In the kitchen two servants were washing and ironing. On the walls were etchings signed by Pasternak's artist father. Books in French, German, English, and Russian were piled on the floor, on chairs and tables and crammed onto shelves.

Like a modern Socrates he posed universal questions that engross the minds and hearts of all men—and eagerly answered them himself. Here is what Boris Pasternak said to me. As it turned out it was probably his last spontaneous testament to mankind:

"IS RELIGION REALLY NECESSARY?

"Yes. I think that man will always strive to find a meaningful form of worship. I was born a Jew. My family was interested in music and art and paid little attention to religious practice. Because I felt an urgent need to find a channel of communication to the Creator, I was converted to Russian Orthodox Christianity. But try as I might, I could not achieve a complete spiritual experience. Thus I am still a seeker. Some people tell me that religion won't make any progress until the world has solved its practical problems. But I believe we shall find it is the other way around.

"IS PATRIOTISM OUTDATED?

"I say no. In this era most problems cry out for international solutions. Nevertheless, love of country is one of the highest and most stirring human emotions. I know that many Russians of my generation went into exile after the revolution, some because they were hunted and others because they could not face the changes that were coming. To me, exile would be worse than death. Patriotism, of course, must not be blind. The mother corrects her child; the son sees the weaknesses of his father. But love does not turn aside from ugliness or error. Loyalty to the land where you were born and the people from whose loins you sprang is the beginning, not the end, of internationalism.

"ARE MOST WORKERS TODAY MERE ROBOTS?

"They need not be. The industrial revolution has made plenty for all a possibility in our time.

"I have never been a farmer and, except during World War I when I worked in a factory in the Urals, I have never been a laborer. Yet I know that agricultural products are the result of a partnership of man and nature, which is uncontrollable, unpredictable and often cruel. A man who fits nuts and bolts together on an assembly line is working in partnership with his fellow men. Surely this is not less noble or less satisfying. I believe passionately in the dignity of all necessary work. At the moment I am writing a play. It is the first I've attempted. I don't know whether I'll ever finish it. But I know that when I complete a line that sounds exactly right, I am better able to love those who love me and to understand those who don't.

"CAN A MAN CONTROL HIS FUTURE?

"Yes. Despite the system he lives under, I believe that men everywhere have more power over the future than ever before. The important thing is that we must choose to exercise it. It is conventional to say that the future belongs to our unborn children but the fact is it belongs to us. What we do today determines how the world shall go. Tomorrow is made up of the sum total of today's experiences. No one knows what the formula is, nor how slight a change may reshape the pattern to our heart's desire. Far from feeling hopeless or helpless, we must seize every opportunity, however small, to help the world around us toward peace, productivity and human brotherhood."

Pasternak's inspiring conversation was still racing when darkness fell. I knew that I had to leave. I told him that I hoped one day to entertain him in my home.

"Perhaps," he said. And he pressed my hand.

The taxi was waiting on the main road. As it whirled through the dusk toward the lights of Moscow, I scribbled furiously. Pasternak certainly did not pretend to be either a lawgiver or a moralist. He was a brilliant, perceptive man who was perhaps more keenly aware of the human condition than most of us can be.

Boris Pasternak will be remembered for his poetry, for his Shakespearean translations, for the controversial novel which cost him the world's most coveted literary prize. I shall always remember him as a man who believed that love, faith, pride, and vigor are the real answers for tomorrow.

TRUTH BROADCASTS ABOUT U.S. RELATIONS WITH CUBA AND LATIN AMERICA TO PEOPLE BEHIND THE IRON CURTAIN

(Excerpts from address by Hon. ALEXANDER WILEY of Wisconsin)

If nuclear-missile war is to be avoided, then the people of the world must rise up, en masse, to provide the governing light for the handling of affairs that affect the interests—yes, even the survival—of mankind.

We do not want war; we do not believe that you—the people of the Soviet Union—want war.

Instead, we believe that you—like ourselves—wish for freedom

To our deep sorrow, however, the threats and counterthreats of war; of strife; of international tensions; of fear from destruction by nuclear-missile attack will continue to threaten peace and survival of mankind.

Why?

The Communists say: It is the fault of the Americans.

The Americans say: It is the fault of the Communists.

Which is true? For the answer, let's look at the post-World War II record of history.

During World War II, the United States—fighting side by side with the Russian people—had a major role in victory against dictators. Yet, we did not take for ourselves 1 foot of territory.

Instead, let me review historically the treatment of nations and peoples once under the wing of the United States.

Philippine Islands: Granted independence in 1946.

Puerto Rico: Became a self-governing commonwealth with its own constitution in 1950.

Alaska: Previously a territory, joined the United States as a State by free election in 1959.

Hawaii: Formerly a territory. By free elections they voted to become the 50th State of the United States in 1959.

Now, let's look at the Communist record. Following World War II, Communists—by treaty breaking—obtained and maintained ironfisted control over such countries as Albania, Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania, Poland, and Rumania.

Yes; and you all remember Hungary.

Moreover, you, the people of a great nation, can best remember how, and with what bloodshed, the Communists gained control of your country.

UNITED STATES-LATIN AMERICAN RELATIONS

Now, looking to the present and future, apparently you are being "hit" with barrages of false propaganda about U.S. relations with our neighbors, in Latin America, particularly in Cuba.

Briefly, let me acquaint you with the truth.

Historically, we have enjoyed excellent relations with the people of Cuba. Our citizens visited friends and vacationed with our island neighbors; American industries made investments that helped improve the economy and create jobs for more workers. Our Government established special programs and policies—such as the sugar agreement—to help Cuba financially—even though it meant economic loss for the United States.

On the two-way street, a great many Cubans came to us: To become citizens; for educational opportunities; for jobs; to enrich us with the Cuban culture, particularly the unique music that is important in their heritage.

Prior to the present regime, Cuba was governed by a dictator. Although we do not approve of dictatorship, the United States—as a policy—does not interfere with the internal affairs of other countries.

Under the leadership of Castro, the dictator was overthrown. With the revolution were born new hopes—particularly in Cuba, the United States and the Western Hemisphere—that the fine people of the island could be free, independent, and self-governing.

Unfortunately, and sadly indeed, Castro is now betraying the great trust placed upon him by the Cuban people. How? In many ways: By unreasonable, unjustified, and erratic lying and distortion of facts, he is attempting to disrupt—if not destroy—good relations with the United States. Although he promised distribution of land under a so-called reform program to the Cuban people, he is failing to fulfill that promise.

Other dictator practices include: Restriction of free press, radio, and television; refusal to hold free elections; trial by firing squad instead of a court system; rubbing out in dictatorial fashion any opposition to his regime.

Regrettably, Soviet Premier Khrushchev approved Castro's dictator methods and is attempting to stick his nose in United States-Cuban relations. We, in accordance with traditional policies, have warned Mr. K. to stay out of the Western Hemisphere.

The real fact is that dictatorship—whether under the guise of communism, nazism, fascism, or similar-type isms—is really dead—killed by long centuries of failure—and should be buried.

Despite the effort to destroy freedom in Cuba, I am confident the betrayal—even with Khrushchev's help—will not succeed.

In the face of erratic tirades by Castro, the United States has demonstrated toleration and forebearance—not the killer-type policies demonstrated by the Kremlin in Hungary. The good people of Cuba—I am confident—will ultimately take matters into their own hands and redirect their fine country onto the right road of progress and freedom.

IMPROVING UNITED STATES-LATIN AMERICAN RELATIONS

To further illustrate the spirit of friendship and cooperation demonstrated by the United States, President Eisenhower recently proposed a new, broad plan of mutual cooperation with Latin America.

What is its purpose?

I quote from the statement by President Eisenhower upon announcing the program:

"In the Americas, as elsewhere, change is the law of life, and the interests of the people will be better served if that change is effected constructively and peacefully, not violently. Clearly, the aspirations and needs of the peoples of the Americas for free institutions and a better way of life must be met. Our desire is to help the American nations to meet their own responsibilities—to help them develop their institutional and human resources, to strengthen the framework of freedom, to protect individual dignity and to gain a better life for those who are underprivileged, underemployed, and undereducated."

CONCLUSION

In conclusion, I want to again assure you that the people of the United States—yes; and of the free world—want above all things, peace. The will of the world, I believe, is for peace. We, the free world, shall expect of you, the great dynamic people of the Soviet Union, help, in spirit and, as you can, in action, to create the conditions and climate of peace for the future.

Our Defense Posture

OF

HON. A. WILLIS ROBERTSON

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 8, 1960

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the address I delivered at the annual banquet of the Virginia Court Clerks' Association, last Friday, August 5, at Hotel Chamberlin, Old Point Comfort, Va., with reference to our present defense posture.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMARKS OF SENATOR A. WILLIS ROBERTSON AT THE ANNUAL BANQUET OF THE VIRGINIA COURT CLERKS' ASSOCIATION, HOTEL CHAMBERLIN, OLD POINT COMFORT, VA., AUGUST 5, 1960

Early in my congressional service, when the handling of domestic issues was not complicated, either by a tremendous national debt incurred in fighting a Second World War, or by a threat to our survival from an unscrupulous foreign dictator, I had the honor and great pleasure of addressing your annual meeting at this lovely and historic hotel. The memory of that meeting nearly a quarter of a century ago will always be a cherished one.

While I do not minimize the seriousness of the economic problems growing out of our greatest depression, they pale into insignificance when compared with the destruction of civilization in the event of another world war. How to prevent such a war is by all means the most serious issue confronting our Nation today.

Hence in this historic area of the Old Dominion which cradled and defended the infancy of our Republic, the scene of victory in our revolutionary fight for independence and freedom, the present location of the world's greatest naval base and shipbuilding facilities, and the training area for our first venture into manned exploration of space, I feel it would be both timely and appropriate to give you a brief report on the Military Establishment we are building with the hope that fear of punishing retaliation will stay the coldblooded and calculating hand of the Soviet dictator.

Most of my congressional service has been devoted to the handling of fiscal matters—10 years in the House during which I, as a member of the Ways and Means Committee, helped to frame 12 tax bills, including the heavy and burdensome income and excise taxes of World War II, and 14 years in the Senate, during which I have served on the Appropriations Committee that has handled unprecedented peacetime budgets, and on the Banking and Currency Committee that has handled vital legislation relating to the congressional power to coin money and fix the value thereof.

With full knowledge of how burdensome our taxes are, with keen appreciation of the importance of a sound and stable economy in a successful fight for the preservation of our cherished democratic institutions, I have been working in recent years for an adequate defense program that could be financed within the framework of a sound fiscal policy. While fully agreeing with the able Secretaries of the Treasury of the present administration concerning the importance of a balanced budget, I have voted in recent years to cut foreign aid and domestic spending by an amount sufficient to measurably increase our defense posture. But for the inclusion a few years ago, on my insistence, of an additional $900 million for strategic bombers which Secretary of Defense Wilson said was not needed and would never be spent, we would not today have our present wings of B–52 bombers—the weapon most feared by the Communists.

Again this year, in advocating an airplane carrier to cost $293 million in the budget but not in the House bill, a start on a wing of B–70 bombers, costing $285 million which was not in either the budget or the House bill and increases for Army modernization, guided missiles and warning systems, I could point to cuts that had been made in the budget for domestic spending and to the cut I thought could and would be made in the mutual assistance or foreign aid program that would more than offset the $661 million that the Congress added to the President's defense budget. If no new spending schemes are adopted in the adjourned session that commences next Monday (and I hope none will be) the President can use all of the defense funds we have appropriated and still close his last fiscal year with one of the largest surpluses of his term.

On the basis of hundreds of pages of expert testimony presented to our Defense Subcommittee on Appropriations I do not think we need a crash program of any military activity costing two or three billion dollars of additional funds as some have proposed.

In order that you may more intelligently follow the debate that is sure to come on this issue in the next few weeks and in the next few months, I will present to you tonight a bird's-eye view of our current defense program and the additional items costing some $660 million which the Congress approved.

We must all recognize quite clearly that world domination has remained a steadfast and paramount Communist goal over the years and that this is the supreme threat to the free world and to our own way of life. Recent events have shown that this threat, exploiting all forms of power, has not lessened but on the contrary has been intensified in critical regions of the world. Indeed, we now see its manifestations at our very doorstep.

In company with this constant pressure against the West and its institutions there has been a change in the nature of the threat. This is reflected by a marked Soviet emphasis on intercontinental missiles and by the emergence of a dynamic, aggressive, and hostile Communist China. In the course of these events, and despite the talk of armament controls, both the Soviet Union and Red China have consistently improved their already large and effective military forces. Simultaneously they have stepped up their expansionist drives in important regions of the world. It is vital that we realize that these threats to our friends all over the globe are actual and direct threats to ourselves. In the long run, we in the United States can be defeated through erosion of the free world position just as well as by any overwhelming attack on our homeland. This means that we must remain strong militarily and that we must be able to successfully counter aggression wherever and in whatever form it may occur. We and our friends must be able to protect ourselves, and to do so the United States must maintain a fast striking, highly effective, modernly equipped Army.

In making its contribution to the national defense program our Army has four main tasks. It keeps forces overseas to deter aggression and to effectively resist such aggression should deterrence fail. It maintains combat-ready strategic units in the United States for rapid reinforcement of our forces in forward areas and those of our allies. Thirdly, it provides a significant share of the air defense of the United States. Lastly, it maintains a base for rapid mobilization, and this includes our civilian component forces as an essential ingredient. In addition to these primary tasks the Army has other important functions. Among these are the furnishing of military advisory groups and training missions to over 40 allied nations, the support of other armed services and governmental agencies, certain support for the atomic delivery systems which we provide other nations, and a large number of other activities which assist our national effort.

To carry out its mission in fiscal year 1961, the Army has been authorized a strength of 870,000 for its active forces and a paid drill strength of 700,000 for its Reserve components—the Army Reserve and the Army National Guard. The Active Army will include 14 divisions, 8 being stationed overseas and 6 being located in the United States. Three of these divisions in the United States will continue to be in a high state of readiness for immediate deployment in any emergency. This is the famed STRAC, "ready around the clock." During the year our Active Army forces will be increased by a battle group, a missile command, two and one-half more Nike battalions, and by two surface-to-surface missile battalions, even though the overall strength stays the same.

In supporting the air defense of the United States the Army's excellent surface-to-air missile units, armed with the Nike-Hercules, will expand their protection of major population centers, bases of the Strategic Air Command, and our industrial base. They will be complemented by other Nike missile units operated by the Army National Guard.

In this connection, all the Army's plans and programs will continue to place heavy dependence upon its Reserve components. Their capability to provide combat-ready units for the immediate backup of the Active Army and to furnish a training base for mobilization is at the highest level in our peacetime history. In particular, six divisions of the Army National Guard are prepared at all times for immediate mobilization and use. This overall state of readiness will continue to improve.

Several years ago it became apparent that new weapons and technology were altering the fundamentals of warfare as they had been known previously. As the result of long and extensive tests and studies, the Army has now revamped its organization and concepts to meet these changing conditions. Today, as never before, it emphasizes quality, flexibility, mobility, and the highest possible state of training and combat readiness. All of these require constant improvement in methods, in ideas, in equipment, and in the human element.

The Army considers the soldier as the basic and indispensable element for the defense of the Nation and so it is natural that it has attempted to attract and retain the best and most highly qualified people. Programs enacted by the Congress have permitted the Active Army to stabilize its personnel, a trend that also has been reflected in the Reserve components. A large part of the Army budget for fiscal year 1961 will go toward the pay and allowances ($3.507 billion, Active Army; $234 million, Army Reserve; $230 million, Air National Guard) of these increasingly capable and highly qualified personnel.

Modernization of our Army has become urgent. The Soviet Union has made vast strides in reequipping its land forces with the most modern weapons. This imposes upon us the absolute necessity to maintain a qualitative superiority if we are to keep our power posture in the international arena and if we are to be prepared to defend ourselves and help our allies protect themselves. Such modernization involves, first, research and development of new equipment and techniques, and then the procurement and issuance to our troops of advanced types of weapons.

The Congress has voted nearly $1½ billion for Army research and development during the new fiscal year. This sum exceeded the President's original budget request by $158,352,000. This will be devoted to a large number of projects, covering specific equipment items as well as many broad research investigations. This money will also finance contracts with educational institutions and will support extensive development and test programs by installations like the White Sands Missile Range and the Engineer Research and Development Laboratory at Fort Belvoir here in Virginia.

It would be difficult indeed to go into the hundreds of projects in this category. As examples of things that will be done, the Congress is concerned with the protection of our industrial and population centers from intercontinental ballistic missiles. The Army's Nike-Zeus is to be given full-scale testing in the near future. In these tests the Nike-Zeus will be set up in the Kwajelein area of the Pacific and will be fired against our own ballistic missiles fired from the West Coast. Many feel that the Air Force's Bomarc is a superior antimissile weapon.

To give our troops better fire support at medium ranges new solid-fueled missiles, such as the Pershing, will be pushed. These will replace older types which although reliable must be replaced by new and improved weapons. Dispersed units in the field need better defense against attack by low-flying aircraft and air-breathing missiles and this added protection will come both from missiles under procurement and from the development of a highly mobile system called the Mauler. Mobility of the Army, so essential if we are to gain the full capabilities of the Pentomic concept, will be enhanced through newer types of aircraft and helicopters, by better combat vehicles, and by more efficient means of transporting supplies. And in the area of firepower the Army is working hard on a new tank, and on better artillery with longer ranges and more lethal effects.

You may be interested in a brief description of a few of these items. There is a flying vehicle called the Avrocar which moves along above the ground on a cushion of air and which the Army hopes will go a long way toward getting some of our soldiers out of the mud. A brand new weapon is the Redeye, a hand-held guided missile that frontline troops can use to shoot down aircraft. And improvements continue on the Davy Crockett, a man-carried weapon which for the first time puts a nuclear weapon in the hands of small units. Really fantastic developments in electronics are being applied to devices for communication and for locating hostile forces and in identifying targets.

However, successful research and development is but the forerunner of procurement. As has been stressed, both are essential to modernization, and the Congress has emphasized its concern that the Army be modernized. During the forthcoming year this modernization will accrue quite largely from the replacement of wornout items by new equipment, and the Congress has made sizable funds available for this purpose—$1½ billion total for procurement.

The firepower of combat forces will be increased through the purchase of a whole family of missiles for use against ground targets. No doubt you have heard the names of some of these—Little John, Honest John, Lacrosse, and Sergeant. Even though the small nuclear weapon Davy Crockett is still being refined through research, initial quantities are going to be bought since this weapon is needed quickly. To continue to improve our air defenses the Army is improving Nike-Hercules. This, of course, is the missile now protecting many of our most vital areas; for instance, the entire Norfolk region, but its effectiveness against a large-scale attack has been seriously questioned.

Air defense for our combat units also is being significantly improved by the purchase this year of more Hawk missiles for use against lower flying aircraft. Conventional forms of firepower are being modernized by new and improved tanks, artillery pieces, and rifles and machineguns. These latter—the rifles and machineguns—will use ammunition made standard for all NATO countries.

To improve its mobility posture the Army is getting quite a few better types of aircraft. These will be used for such things as photography, reconnaissance, and the transportation of troops and supplies within the area of combat. Too, there will be some new helicopters which can lift up to 32 men or as much as 3 tons of equipment. While movement in the air is important, our modern Army still needs large amounts of surface transportation. For this reason, some 18,000 trucks will be bought, as well as quantities of armored personnel carriers.

The growing tempo of warfare, using all these improved weapons and faster means of getting from place to place, impose critical problems in connection with the command and control of all these diverse elements. For this purpose the Army will get new radios, teletype machines, and electronic systems to help locate enemy forces and targets.

The speed at which things take place, together with the large amounts of machines and weapons, make it essential that the flow of food, ammunition, gasoline, and all sorts of other supplies, keep pace with the battle. You may be sure that items like roadbuilding equipment, mobile bridges, generators for large amounts of electric power, are being bought.

Related closely to the modernization of the Army is the ability to move it strategically to the part of the world where it is needed. As you know, the Army depends upon its sister services for this transportation by sea and by air. The Congress has given special attention to this matter and has decided that our capability to move the Army needs strengthening. So funds ($310 million) have been given the Air Force for the particular purpose of modernizing its airlift through purchase of the most modern type of planes and the development of new types.

In addition to the operation and maintenance of installations, already mentioned, there is the need to continue certain military construction. For the active Army ($148.4 million) the Congress has approved additions to the Nike-Hercules air defense system, mainly in new radar sites. It has provided for building the necessary test facilities for the Nike-Zeus, and for airfields and helioports needed by the Army's aviation program. A limited amount of new construction is also planned for maintenance facilities, hospitals, and troop housing. We have given additional funds for new and better armories and training facilities for our Reserve Components ($16 million for the Army Reserves; $17.5 for the Army National Guard).

Of the moneys appropriated by the Congress for the Army, an appreciable amount will be devoted to activities and projects in the State of Virginia. Some of these, like armories and public works, are quite firmly planned, while others, like procurement contracts, can only be estimated at this time. However, it would appear at present that from the funds made available to the Army, expenditures during fiscal year 1961 will approximate the following amounts:

	Million
Civilian payroll	$52.1
Military payroll	71.2
National Guard (pay, operation and maintenance)	6.0
Construction, Active Army	9.2
Construction, Army Reserve	1.0
Construction, ANG	.6
Procurement contracts (over $10,000 only)	76.0
Civil works (under Army Corps of Engineers)	6.0

The overall effect of congressional action on the Navy budget was to add $258 million for procurement and ship construction and $50 million for research and development. Sixty-eight million dollars was cut in other areas, mainly in operations and maintenance and military construction. The Navy budget approved by both Houses of Congress was $12.35 billion, an increase of about $230 million over that recommended by the President. But let me discuss these events in a little greater detail.

The funds in the budget provided for the support of 619,000 active duty personnel and 129,000 Reserve personnel, 817 ships of the active fleet and 6,800 aircraft. The Navy's budget request included funds for the support of the Navy Shore Establishment, which also was reduced in size, both in number of facilities and personnel.

The funds in the President's budget request provided for procurement of 658 aircraft and several types of guided missiles, the building of 20 new ships, 14 of which were for the purpose of antisubmarine warfare, and modernization of 15 other ships.

It is interesting to note that the new ships included one attack aircraft carrier, five guided missile frigates and destroyers, two escort vessels, one nuclear powered attack submarine, three Polaris ballistic missile submarines plus long leadtime items for nine more, and six other ships.

The funds also provided for the procurement of new equipment for detection and attack of enemy submarines and aircraft and for communication equipment for ships, aircraft and supporting stations.

In the Navy's original budget request were funds for the research, development, test and evaluation of many types of equipment, stressing improvements in antisubmarine warfare equipment, attack ability of the fleet, nuclear power propulsion, and aircraft and ship missile systems. Funds were also requested for space projects. Increase in mobility and reaction speed of the striking power of the Marine Corps were provided for in the research and development funds.

After hearings and deliberations on the Navy's budget the House Appropriations Committee recommended substantial changes, the most drastic of which was deletion of the aircraft carrier.

After the House completed action on the Navy budget, hearings were held by the Senate Appropriations Committee in which the Navy programs were again reviewed. After serious consideration the Senate recommended restoration of the attack carrier in the budget, as well as other changes to the House recommendations. In so doing, the Senate reaffirmed its faith in the Navy's attack carrier striking force as a powerful and valuable weapon in wars of all kinds. I should like to state here that I have always been a firm believer in the value of the attack carrier and have supported a strong carrier program on every possible occasion. As a member of the Senate Appropriations Committee I was able to express my convictions, and, I believe, helped to convince my colleagues as to the great importance of this new carrier to the sea supremacy of the United States.

In the joint conference meeting on June 25, the House and the Senate Appropriations Committees compromised in their action on the President's appropriation bill, agreeing on restoration of funds for the attack carrier, and on five Polaris ballistic missile submarines with long leadtime items for seven more. The joint conference also agreed to provide funds for four nuclear attack submarines and two destroyer escorts, a $50 million augmentation for research and development in antisubmarine warfare, and cuts in other areas amounting to $207 million. The overall increases in the Navy budget amounted to about $350 million.

The additional funds voted by the Congress will be of material assistance in improvement of the Navy's readiness for war. In strengthening procurement and research and development efforts these funds assist significantly toward giving the country an aggressive, modern Navy equipped with weapons superior to those of any possible enemy.

As you know, the 20th of July marked the advent of a new and highly effective deterrent force when the successful firing of two Polaris missiles took place from a submerged Polaris submarine, the George Washington. The additional funds voted by the Congress for a total of five of these ballistic missile submarines to be started this year will provide a major augmentation of this invaluable and invulnerable deterrent force. With these voted by the Congress the total authorized to be built is 14. Since each submarine holds 16 Polaris solid propellant missiles the Congress has increased by 32 the number of nuclear armed ballistic missiles which can be fired against any aggressor from virtually invulnerable platforms. Polaris missiles are capable of a range of more than 1,000 nautical miles and will be equipped with nuclear warheads. Later versions expected to be available in 1962 will be capable of about 1,500 nautical miles and by 1965 up to 2,500 nautical miles. The missiles can be fired rapidly from the Polaris submarine either submerged or on the surface. The first two Polaris submarines will be ready for operations with missiles on board later this year. Two of the five ballistic missile submarines approved by the Congress for fiscal year 1961 have already been awarded to naval shipyards. The remaining three have been awarded on competitive bids to private yards. Of these, one will be built by the Newport News Shipbuilding Co.

Aside from Polaris types the three additional nuclear attack submarines added by the Congress to the one in the Navy budget will be highly important additions to the Navy's growing fleet of these revolutionary ships. Currently there are 9 completed and 23 others authorized, most of which are building. The new attack submarines are capable of sustained high speed while submerged. They are one of the Navy's most effective means of countering enemy submarines of which the Russians have over 400. They are many times more effective than the diesel-powered types previously built, of which the Navy now has about 95. The contract for at least one of the four fiscal year 1961 submarines will be let on a competitive basis to a private yard. The construction of the other three will be determined later.

Navy offensive capabilities will be greatly improved by the antisubmarine warfare research and development funds provided by the Congress. Additional research funds of $50 million will provide for development of new equipment of all types. The funds will be used to expedite the development of present antisubmarine warfare projects which are nearing completion, to increase effort in ocean surveillance systems, and to develop new weapon systems and methods of defeating enemy submarines. Some of these funds will augment basic research in the field of ocean surveillance by long-range acoustics.

Thus it can be seen that the addition of the funds by the Congress has given a sizable boost to Navy's defense programs for fiscal year 1961 and will have its effect on readiness of the fleet and in the deterrence of general war in the very near future.

The attack carrier funds for which were restored in the budget by Senate action, will provide a badly needed replacement for one of the remaining World War II Essex class, which are now becoming obsolescent and are near the end of their useful life.

The new carrier will be an improved Forrestal class ship. It will be about 77,000 tons, with a flight deck of about 1,025 feet, almost a fifth of a mile. Its angled deck, mirror landing system, and heavy-duty catapults and arresting gear will permit handling of modern high-performance aircraft with safety and speed. Its flight deck will be 71 percent larger in area than the World War II Essex class ships. It will be able to operate aircraft in rough seas which would prevent so doing in the case of Essex ships. The ammunition capacity will be three times, the aviation fuel capacity double that of the Essex class. Working space, maintenance shops, and many other features will be vastly more modern, convenient, and efficient than in previous ship types. The new carrier will add greatly to the power of the attack carrier striking force when it joins the fleet in 1965.

The attack carrier striking force, of which the fiscal year 1961 carrier will be a significant element, is essential to U.S. Navy sea supremacy. It is the most powerful tool in the world for maintaining control of the seas and for establishing control of land areas from the seas. This force will keep sea lanes open for free world nations and deny them to the enemy for many years to come. Perhaps most significant of all, it is a force which is sovereign in itself. It is not subject to the changing climates to which our other bases are subject. This means that it can be in position and prepared to project our forces when needed overseas without danger of revocation by some other authority.

Both the offensive and defensive capabilities of the Air Force were strengthened substantially through recent appropriations.

Money was provided to take the B–70 bomber program out of the prototype development stage and put this airplane into production as the most powerful manned aircraft yet devised. While the President had asked for only $75 million to build two B–70 prototypes, the Congress raised this to $265 million so the Air Force could proceed as rapidly as possible to develop this 2,000-mile-an-hour airplane as a fighting weapon. Many experts believe that this is the ultimate transitional craft between manned and unmanned offensive aerial striking power.

Moreover, the Congress appropriated another $100 million to be used either for additional fighter aircraft or for the B–70. If these funds are used entirely for the bomber, a total of $365 million can be put into the B–70 program.

On the defensive side, the Air Force and the Defense Department have revised their planning against attack of the North American Continent by manned bombers.

Careful attention was paid to the reduced number of Bomarc interceptor missiles that would be available in the near-term future, the optimum deployment of the manned fighter-interceptor force because of this, and the complex requirements for adequate ground environment systems—that is, the devices used to detect and identify attacking forces and to control the defensive weapons turned against them.

These revisions provide for the redeployment and reequipping of our manned fighter-interceptor force and a number of adjustments and improvements in our radar warning network. Still more revisions are being planned and will be announced later.

In this connection, the 48th Fighter-Interceptor Squadron at Langley Air Force Base is to be reequipped in September of this year with improved F–106 aircraft to enable it to perform its functions with greater speed, effectiveness, and power.

Today, the predominant threat is unquestionably from the Soviet strategic bomber force. The threat from this force will continue to exist indefinitely into the future. As time progresses, however, the threat of the growing Soviet ICBM force will rapidly become our principal concern. Air Force analysis indicated that maximum achievable effectiveness against the total threat would result from an accelerated completion of a semiautomatic defense system against the manned bomber, substantially improved over that existing today, coupled with further concentration on timely deployment of systems designed to counter the ballistic missile threat.

Specifically, the Bomarc interceptor missile program is being substantially reduced to 7 "A" and 9 "B" squadron equivalents (28 launchers per squadron) located on 10 bases, including 2 in Canada. Modernization of the manned fighter-interceptor force is expected to offset this Bomarc reduction to a degree adequate to meet the threat. Nonetheless, the decrease in total weapons available made it necessary to reposition and reequip certain units of the manned fighter-interceptor force in consonance with the reduced numbers of Bomarc to be deployed and with other existing air defense weapons.

A twofold objective guided all planning in this repositioning and reequipping of fighters. The first objective was to insure maximum defense capability along the most probable attack routes toward the most important national strategic targets. The second was to provide a rough equivalence in all areas of the United States as regards the relationship between weapons available, strategic targets to be defended, and enemy attack capabilities. This planning involves reducing the total number of weapons previously located in certain of the States and in other areas of the North American continent, as well as reequipping certain fighter-interceptor squadrons with aircraft of improved performance. The planned changes in the manned fighter-interceptor force may be summarized as follows:

REPOSITIONING

(a) Movement of three squadrons to different bases.

(b) Inactivation of six squadrons and transferring their aircraft and equipment to the Air National Guard or other Regular Air Force squadrons.

REEQUIPPING

(a) Replacing the aircraft in nine Regular Air Force and seven Air National Guard squadrons with aircraft of higher performance.

(b) Increasing the number of aircraft in four squadrons to provide greater defense capability in the areas where these squadrons are located.

One of the major portions of our air defense system is the ground environment, that is, the radar, radio and computer devices which are employed for detection and identification of hostile aircraft and for control of our defense missiles and fighter-interceptors. As you are aware, the revision of our previous air defense plan as presented to the Congress in March of this year included many changes in this ground environment. Specifically, we recommended cancellation of the SAGE supercombat center program and certain modifications in the original SAGE 1 program. This reorientation of our semiautomotic control centers made it necessary to revise our previous plans for deployment of radars. Certain radars which were required to support our SAGE supercombat centers now are either not required or contribute very little to the overall command and control system. Included among these radars which are no longer required are sites which have previously been in operation as well as those which were planned but have not yet been constructed.

The Air Force expects to shut down the radar equipment at 13 of these stations within the next 12 months, and to cancel plans for another station not yet constructed.

Let me say in conclusion that no man—in the Congress, in the White House or in the Pentagon—can tell with certainty whether our Defense Establishment is adequate at any given moment to meet and completely defeat every possible combination of assaults that might be made on us. We simply do the best we can, on the basis of the best available advise and planning, to keep the country as strong and as alert as possible within the means available for a long and continuing effort.

In this connection, I am glad to say that no authorization bill passed by the Armed Services Committee of the Senate since the start of the cold war has ever failed to get adequate funds from the Appropriations Committee on which I serve. I mentioned earlier some examples in which additional funds were made available for particular programs that seemed vital in our judgment.

I am informed that, starting next year, the Armed Services Committee will enter still more fully into the area of authorizing legislation on the procurement of aircraft, missiles, and vessels as part of its plan to oversee more closely than even before the area of military policy planning. This undoubtedly will permit the Appropriations Committee to work in still closer harmony with the Defense Establishment and the Armed Services Committee.

I can assure you that the elimination of waste and inefficiency in the procurement of items ranging from aircraft carriers to paper clips will continue to be a major concern of the Congress, but no price tag will be placed upon our security and the Congress can be depended upon to appropriate sufficient funds to maintain our present military superiority.

SENATE

TUESDAY, AUGUST 9, 1960

The Senate met in executive session at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by the Vice President.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D.D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who strengthenest the hearts of men, with the weariness of the world upon us, with burdens that are too great for us to carry alone, we need Thee every hour, most gracious Lord. No other voice save Thine can peace afford.

In all the deafening distractions of these days, keep our hearts, we pray, so close to Thee that by the vision of the vast sweep of Thy purpose we may be delivered from the sting of irritating trifles and be less disturbed by the petty annoyances of demanding duties which lay their claims upon us day by day.

Thus with the pressing affairs of state draining the endurance of those who here would be Thy ministers for the healing of the nations, for this hallowed moment we would lift our eyes above weariness and worry and world confusion to Thyself, who art peace and rest, forgiveness and renewal, challenge and inspiration, hope and joy.

So, with our differing needs, meet each of us, we beseech Thee, as Thou dost come down Thy secret stairs into each life. Send us to our tasks saying of Thee—as men and women such as we have said across the centuries—"He restoreth my soul."

We ask it in the spirit of the Redeemer. Amen.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

RESOLUTION IN SUPPORT OF ANDERSON-HUMPHREY-McCARTHY AMENDMENT TO SOCIAL SECURITY ACT

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, the president and certain members of the Hotel and Restaurant Employees Union, Local No. 556, of St. Paul, Minn., have submitted to me a resolution in support of Senator ANDERSON's medical care amendment to the Social Security Act which I joined in cosponsoring.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this resolution be printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOTEL AND RESTAURANT EMPLOYEES UNION, LOCAL NO. 556,
St. Paul, Minn., August 3, 1960.

Hon. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY,
U.S. Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR HUMPHREY: We, the undersigned citizens and voters of Minnesota, respectfully urge our U.S. Senators to renew and redouble their efforts to obtain passage of genuine and meaningful health care for the aged legislation during the August recess session of the current Congress.

We feel that the Anderson amendment, introduced June 30 by Senator CLINTON P. ANDERSON, joined by Senators HUMPHREY and MCCARTHY, should be adopted by the Senate Finance Committee, or, failing that, by floor amendment.

We believe that the Anderson amendment has not only the best chance—but probably the only chance of enactment by the Senate and by the House during the few remaining weeks of the current session.

LEONARD JOHNSON, Secretary.
LESTER K. NELSON, President.
ROBERT HOSTRAWSER, Vice President.

CIVIL RIGHTS

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, in the message which the President sent to us on yesterday, he had the following to say on the subject of civil rights:

> Only one major measure—civil rights—had then been passed, and this had two major deletions which I hope will now be restored in keeping with the bipartisan support evidenced for these items last month.

In pursuance of that and in pursuance of the expressed hope of the President that these two items, which appeared in the original package bill which I introduced on the 15th of February, will now be restored, I am now prepared, Mr. President, to submit those two items as an amendment to the civil rights bill. They are quite well known, I think, to every Member of the Senate.

The first one deals with the Commission on Equal Job Opportunity under Government Contracts. That is old ground; we have plowed it many times. Today the Commission exists by virtue of an Executive order. It gets its funds by allocation from the effective agencies dealing with Federal contracts. This measure would give the Commission statutory authority, and would make it possible for Congress then to appropriate out of the Treasury for the work of the Commission. But I should make it clear that the Commission can continue notwithstanding that that statutory authority does not exist.

The second section of the bill provides for assistance to State and local educational agencies. It provides not only technical and nonteaching assistance, but also financial assistance to States and localities and to local school districts.

All this has been freely discussed.

Mr. President, I now introduce the bill with two titles, which are the deletions out of the original civil-rights package, and ask for the first reading of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be read by title.

The bill (S. 3823) to amend the Civil Rights Act of 1960 in order to establish a Commission on Equal Job Opportunity under Government Contracts, and to authorize assistance to State and local educational agencies to effectuate desegregation in public schools, introduced by Mr. DIRKSEN (for himself, Mr. SCOTT, Mr. CASE of New Jersey, Mr. KEATING, Mr. JAVITS, Mr. FONG, Mr. MORTON, Mr. ALLOTT, Mr. WILEY, Mr. KUCHEL, and Mr. COOPER, was read the first time by its title.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, as I understand, under the unanimous-consent agreement, the Senator from Illinois as a matter of right may introduce this bill for the first reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct.

Mr. RUSSELL. Does the Chair hold that the reading which has been had at the desk is a compliance with the rule?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes.

Mr. RUSSELL. That is compliance with the rule?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator has a right to introduce the bill, despite its rather checkered history in the past and the part the distinguished Senator played on the opposite side of the issue when we were in session here just a few scant weeks ago.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, on that point I must freely confess to the distinguished Senator from Georgia my sins of omission and commission. Being something of a realist, in that rather long 8-week tour de force I recognized full well that if we were to get a bill, one had to retreat somewhat from his position. I offer no apology for it; I freely confess it at this time, in the interest of consummating a bill.

But here is the request in the special message of the President, submitted to us on the first day the Senate convened in this session. In that message the President expresses the hope that these deletions will be restored. So the proposal I offer for first reading contains only those two provisions, and nothing more. It is not designed to embarrass anyone; rather, it is designed to carry out the program manifested by the President many, many months ago in this field.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. RUSSELL. Does the Senator from Illinois have any reason to expect that the interest of the President in these provisions will be any deeper than it was when they were first brought up?

Mr. DIRKSEN. No, Mr. President, the interest of the President of the United States has in no particular been modified. Like myself, I think he is a realist. When one cannot get a whole loaf, one gets whatever bread he can. Then, if he is impelled by conviction, he undertakes to get the rest of the loaf. That is precisely what is being endeavored at the present time.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I did not hear the Chair refer the bill to committee. Has the Chair done so?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill has not yet been read the second time, and therefore has not been referred.

Is there objection to the second reading of the bill?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I ask for the second reading of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The second reading of the bill is requested.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia will state it.

Mr. RUSSELL. After the second reading, will the bill be referred as a matter of course?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the rule, the bill would then be referred, as a matter of course, unless some other step were taken by action of the Senate.

Mr. RUSSELL. I wonder whether the distinguished Senator from Illinois, who often states his willingness to confess his sins of omission or commission or otherwise, will be gracious enough to advise as to whether he has any objection to having the bill referred.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I would prefer that the bill not be referred. I hope the bill will go to the calendar.

So I ask for the second reading. But, under the rule, I think there could be objection to the second reading, if any Senator sought to object.

Mr. RUSSELL. I am well aware of the rights I have under the rules, up to this stage of the proceedings. I do not know what the Chair might hold from here on. But up to this stage of the proceedings, I am thoroughly familiar with my rights under the rules and under the precedents.

Mr. President, I feel that I must reserve an objection to the request for a second reading in view of the statement of the Senator from Illinois, the distinguished minority leader, that he would ask, under the very absurd and unusual precedent set by the Senate in 1957, that this bill go to the calendar.

I feel that this is a rather unusual situation. We had both of these issues here in the Senate this spring. I believe February 15 was the sacred date of the beginning of the great debate on this issue; we debated it here for some weeks. A number of votes were had, and it so happened that the Senate had a separate vote on each of these items that are offered now as a two-title bill by the Senator from Illinois.

I remember very clearly that the motion to lay on the table the so-called FEPC item was made by the Senator from Illinois himself; and I was glad to support him in that motion. I was much pleased when his motion prevailed, and the FEPC item, which I had referred to, I fear a little unwisely, as the "salute to NIXON" section of the bill in early debate, was laid on the table.

I had hoped that in spite of what, I am afraid, was a little inadvertent but a completely truthful statement I had made, the Senator might be moved to lay it on the table. But despite the fact that I had given it that title, he did indeed move to lay it on the table. I supported his motion as vigorously as I could. I followed his leadership then. I cannot follow it now.

Mr. President, nothing more clearly demonstrates how a bad legislative precedent, however noble may be the intention of those who seek to set it, returns to plague the Senate. The Senator from Illinois, who made the motion to table, stated then—and states today—that this bill does not give the Vice President's Commission one iota of additional power to that it now has under the Executive order under which it operates. He states that very clearly. But for some reason he now wants to get statutory standing for this Commission. Could it be that this move is being made in the light of what may develop or will develop in this country come November 8, when we shall have a general election?

Mr. President, several years ago we had the issue before us, when the Senate decided, on the oleomargarine bill, that a bill of any nature that comes before the Senate had to be referred to a committee in the due legislative process. We overturned that precedent in 1957, and we did it because the majority of the Senate thought the end justified the means, and was determined to bypass the Judiciary Committee on the pretext that it is a graveyard for civil rights legislation. A majority of the Senate took that position and was supported generally in the press of the country.

That precedent, which was justified under the theory that the end justified the means and was sought to be applied to merely political requests, is now to be applied to a bill that will not go to the Judiciary Committee.

The claim cannot be made that this measure will be buried in the Judiciary Committee, presided over by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND]. Nobody can say that about this bill. This bill will go to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, as has every other FEPC bill. This, of course, is the appropriate committee to consider every bill that deals with education or labor.

I would like to know just what objection the Senator has to letting this bill take the regular legislative process and go to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. The distinguished Senator from Illinois is a member of that committee. No charge has been made that that committee is the graveyard of legislation of any type. It is a very liberal committee. It is a committee that has among its membership some of the outstanding liberals of this Nation, men who are recognized for having great devotion to this type of legislation.

Mr. President, nothing could better depict the evils that flow from departing from a fair construction of the rules than the matter presented here today. Instead of moving to discharge the Judiciary Committee in 1957, as the Senate should have done—and as it had the votes to do—it bypassed the committee. Now, when the facts which influenced the Senate at that time are not now applicable at all, because the bill would go to an entirely different committee, we find that the distinguished Senator from Illinois seeks to use this very jaundiced precedent in an effort to bypass the committee system of this body.

I noticed that the distinguished Senator from Illinois almost grimaced when he read from the President's message "in keeping with the bipartisan support." [Laughter.]

I am sure that the distinguished Senator from Illinois is only seeking bipartisanship here in bringing this matter to the attention of the Senate. Of course, the distinguished Senator may have some other purpose. There is other legislation pending such as minimum wage and health insurance for the old folks. There may be those who will be surprised at some of the votes of these "mammals of reactionaryism" when we get into that area. We also have proposals involving situs picketing, and matters of that sort.

I doubt that the distinguished Senator from Illinois is supporting all those bills, all along the line. He will have taken pretty good measures to prevent their consideration by the Senate if he succeeds in his effort to bypass the committee of which he is a member. I hope the Senator from Illinois will relent and let the bill go to committee in the normal course of procedure.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, from the ancient parchments comes the saying that one should not be weary in well-doing. I am afraid that when we started that rather vigorous crusade on the 15th day of February of this year we somehow retreated from that great admonition of old and became a little weary in well-doing, and, as a result, I was willing to see some concessions on these two particular provisions, first, because some saw in this first provision an incipient FEPC. In the second item there was, in the nature of a preamble, or sometimes referred to as a stump speech, an item which speaks of the obligation of school districts in States with respect to the Supreme Court decision in 1954.

As a general thing, I am rather allergic to speeches of that kind in legislation, but I did not put it in there. The matter came up in that fashion, as a part of the package. When it became quite evident, after 8 weeks of marching up the hill and down again, that in order to get some civil rights action it would be necessary to compromise, I was willing to do so.

Compromise is not an unknown art in the political field. The very nature of our Government was developed out of compromise, for in 1787 in Philadelphia, when there was sharp disagreement between the little States like Delaware and Rhode Island on the one hand and the larger and more populous States like Virginia, New York, and Massachusetts on the other hand, out of the controversy came a compromise, by which every State, regardless of size, would have two Members of this body who could not be taken away without the consent of the State, and the membership of the other body would be determined by the population of each State. That was one of the great compromises. Out of it there came a beautiful system of checks and balances which adds up to the constitutional system of this Republic.

So I was willing to compromise. But my conviction remained, and the conviction of the President remained. I assure my esteemed friend from Georgia that this is entirely free from political or partisan considerations. If it were not so, this would not have been here in February of 1960, long before the spectacle in Los Angeles—and, to make sure that I am not misunderstood, long before the spectacle in Chicago in 1960. It came here early in the year under an arrangement or a gentleman's agreement that I had with the majority leader that a bill in this field would be called up on the 15th of February. May it be said to his everlasting credit that the majority leader was as good as his word. When the 15th day of February came the Stella school bill was called up, and we added this to that bill, and Stella became a legend in the country and in the world.

This is nothing new. This was before us for months before any national convention—months before any political considerations—months before distinguished Members of this body found themselves the cynosure of all eyes everywhere in the country.

I do not believe, Mr. President, it can be properly alleged that there is political motivation. This is a job of restoring what was taken out of the package. If I was weary in my diligence or in my vigor in those earlier days, I confess my sins. I have no objection to doing so. However, I do not confess that my convictions went with it.

If it is said that we have acted on this and therefore we should take no action, I point out that twice we have passed an area assistance bill. Twice the bill was vetoed by the President, because he felt it was "frittering away" public funds in the form in which the bill was sent to him. I am now advised—but not authoritatively—that the subcommittee of the Committee on Banking and Currency will meet on Thursday to reconsider the area redevelopment bill.

I submitted two bills for the administration. This comes back to us now. I do not know what the committee is going to do, but I must say there is an interesting, tenacious quality in government which somehow says, "Never say die." Much of the legislation which develops and finds its way to the statute books results from the fact that people have some convictions, and they follow through relentlessly, earnestly, and vigorously because of a belief that something ought to be done in that field.

Mr. RUSSELL and Mr. KEATING addressed the Chair.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I think that expresses the position.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield first to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I did not mean to challenge the devotion of the distinguished Senator to the cause which he presented this morning. I was appealing to the Senator in the interest of orderly procedure. Of all persons in the Senate who should be in favor of orderly procedure at this extraordinary recess session of the Senate, it seems to me the distinguished Senator from Illinois should be most interested.

We are to consider appropriation bills. We are to consider proposed legislation, of which the Senator speaks, relating to depressed areas. We are to consider a wide variety of other bills. If the Senator is as sincere in his espousal of those bills as he says he is with respect to this measure, which was laid on the table by his own motion no longer ago than last April, it seems to me the Senator certainly should be in favor of orderly procedure and of following the ordinary operations of the Senate in permitting the matter to go to the committee.

It so happens the Senator refers to this as a bill which is advanced by the administration. Very frankly, I will say that this bill is far too pale to attract support of many of the so-called civil rights advocates on this side of the Chamber. I see some of them now in the Chamber who would hardly consider it worth the time of the Senate which we have already consumed; it is a milk and water bill in the eyes of the real advocates of civil rights legislation.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes.

Mr. CLARK. Is it not true that the bill which my friend from Georgia holds in his hand——

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania address himself to me? I am glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator is correct; I am holding the floor by sufferance.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania to ask the Senator from Georgia a question.

Mr. CLARK. I wished to ask the Senator if it were not true that the bill he held in his hand, as I understand it, which is being advocated by the distinguished minority leader, does not contain at least one or two provisions against which the minority leader voted earlier in the session, in connection with motions to table things which we so-called advocates of civil rights were then advocating.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I had already asserted that the distinguished Senator from Illinois himself made the motion to lay upon the table the FEPC provision. He was supported in that motion by 21 members of his party. Later he was joined by 24 members of his party in a vote on tabling the other part of this bill, when the motion was made to table that.

Mr. President, I point out that no argument can be raised except that of political desire to justify bypassing the committee to get this matter before the Senate before these other bills, to which the Senator has a large number of amendments, are considered.

We cannot blame this on the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND]. As a matter of fact, the Committee on the Judiciary has 10 Democrats and 5 Republicans as members. The Democrats have a 2-to-1 advantage on that committee. However, on the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, to which the bill would be referred in the ordinary course of Senate procedure, there are 9 Democrats and 6 Republicans, which is only a 3-to-2 advantage.

I ask the distinguished Senator, before he asks to have the bill read a second time, to look at the membership of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare of the Senate.

The committee is presided over by the distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL]. True, the Senator from Alabama is a southerner, but the Senator is recognized at least in some areas of the country as being a rather liberal-thinking public servant.

We go on down the list, and we find next the Honorable JAMES E. MURRAY, a tower of liberal strength over many years in the Senate of the United States.

We then come to the Honorable JOHN F. KENNEDY of Massachusetts, who is a member of the committee. For some reason the Senator from Illinois might be a little bit leery about submitting one of his bills to the consideration of the Senator from Massachusetts in the period between now and November 8.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Where is the Senator, by the way?

Mr. RUSSELL. I am sure if the Senator will consult the records he will find that the Senator from Massachusetts, the standard bearer of the Democratic Party, voted against him and voted for both of these propositions when they were considered on the floor of the Senate in April. So the Senator from Illinois has no reason to mistrust the Senator from Massachusetts.

The next member of the committee is Hon. PAT MCNAMARA, of the State of Michigan. It is not necessary for me to discuss the attitude of that distinguished Senator with respect to legislation in this area. His whole career has been marked by what to me has been far too much zeal in measures of such radical character.

The next member of the committee is the Senator from Oregon, Hon. WAYNE MORSE, who for years, until some of these other gentlemen came to the Senate, was the high apostle of civil rights in the Senate.

I will not go through the list member by member.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I think the Senator should.

Mr. RUSSELL. I shall be glad to do so. I think when I conclude, the Senator from Illinois will be glad to have the bill entrusted to this distinguished committee.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I am glad to yield further to the esteemed Senator from Georgia for the purpose of continuing his analysis.

Mr. RUSSELL. The next member of the committee is Hon. RALPH W. YARBOROUGH, of Texas, a southern liberal, who has demonstrated his attitude by his fight in the Senate for liberal causes.

The next member of the committee is the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK], who has just reproached the Senator for not seizing Time by the forelock and supporting this measure when he had an opportunity to do so in April.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I cannot tell whether he is blushing as a result of that action or not.

Mr. RUSSELL. The next member of the committee on the list is the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH] who likewise voted in April against the Senator's effort to lay this proposal on the table.

The next member of the committee is the distinguished liberal from the State of New Jersey, Senator HARRISON A. WILLIAMS, who likewise voted in April against the Senator's effort to lay this provision on the table.

Now we come to the members of the committee who are on the other side of the table. I must confess that the ranking Republican on this committee has constitutional convictions that would probably prevent him from being too active in supporting the Senator's proposal. The Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] is the ranking Republican, and he is a man of very strong convictions. I doubt that he has changed his mind between April and August. But he is the chairman of the Republican campaign committee, and the Senator knows he would give his leader a fair shake in the consideration of the bill by the committee.

The next member of the committee is the distinguished minority leader himself, EVERETT MCKINLEY DIRKSEN, from the State of Illinois. He is a member of the committee which would appropriately, under the procedures of the Senate, handle this bill. So the Senator should not say he would not be in a position to agitate and to fight with all the fervor of the inspired conviction that he expresses here today, to get the bill out of the committee under the ordinary processes.

The next member of the committee is the distinguished Senator from New Jersey, Senator CLIFFORD P. CASE. The distinguished Senator from New Jersey left his leader when the leader moved to lay the proposal on the table when it was before the Senate in April. The Senator from New Jersey voted for the provision then. There is no reason to doubt that he would assist the Senator now to get his bill out of the Labor and Public Welfare Committee of the Senate.

Who is the next Senator? The distinguished Senator from New York, Hon. JACOB K. JAVITS.

What more perfect setting does the Senator from Illinois want than an array like that? A team that strong could take this pale civil rights bill and push it through the committee before any of us had an opportunity even to be heard.

Those Members are supported further by the Senator from Vermont, Hon. WINSTON L. PROUTY. Of course, the Honorable Norman Brunsdale is no longer a Member of the Senate.

Mr. President, in view of the composition of that committee, I again urge the Senator not to jeopardize this whole session of the Senate by requesting the unusual procedure he has suggested. The Senator says that he did not want to jeopardize the civil rights bill when it was before the Senate, and therefore he moved to lay this provision on the table in April. But now he resorts to this unusual and bizarre procedure, which would jeopardize all legislation at this session of the Congress.

Let there be no misunderstanding. Some of us will resort to any means at our command to give the bill proper consideration. We are rather accustomed to being whipping boys under ordinary circumstances, but we do not like to be whipped in public for political purposes on the eve of a presidential election. We shall resist it as vigorously as we know how.

I urge the Senator to let the bill go to the committee in the normal course.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, let me give my distinguished friend from Georgia the facts of life. I know how long was the struggle in the Labor and Public Welfare Committee on the so-called Kennedy-Landrum-Griffin bill. I know how long we sat in conference. We were in the Old Supreme Court Chamber for 11 days; and if the minority leader had not threatened to come forth with a resolution to concur in the House bill, we might not have gotten a bill.

There were some bobtails, such as the secondary boycott provision, which are even now before that committee. The committee tried to move them out this morning. I understand it was attempted without a quorum being present.

I have not served on that committee this long without knowing what we are up against. We can read the list of the membership if we like, but there is politics on that side as well as on every other side. Let us not be fooled.

So I do not want the bill to go to the committee. I know what would happen. The steamroller has run over us on every amendment that we have offered on the minimum wage bill, and, with one or two modest exceptions, on the Landrum-Griffin bill; and if it had not been for the spirit, the firmness and the conviction of the House conferees, I do not know what would have been written upon the statute books.

I have been through the processes of the committee. I am a part of the committee. I know what goes on. That is why, Mr. President, I do not want the bill to go to a graveyard, for the simple reason that the President has made an honorable, simple request.

No one will ever embarrass the minority leader by charging him with having changed his mind or reversed his position on other occasions. One cannot have been in this man's town for 28 years, in the House and Senate, without developing a pretty tough skin and recognizing the verities of political life.

I remember the old ditty:

The King of France with 20,000 men
Went up the hill, and then came down again;

I have marched up the hill many times; I have marched down. God willing, if I am alive long enough, I suppose I will march up the hill again and march back down again. But when I reach the bottom of the hill, I will still be looking at the summit to see where I rightfully belong.

That is precisely what is involved here. I went down that hill after 8 weeks, and I want to march back up again.

One becomes weary in well doing. The firebell rang at 2 o'clock in the morning, 4 o'clock, 6 o'clock, midnight, and 10 o'clock. While I was trying to woo Morpheus suddenly that awful clang occurred, and I thought, "goodness, who wants to go through all this again?" I do not want to go through it again. Why not take up the bill?

That suggestion brings me to the important point. The Senator from Georgia talks about orderly procedure. I ask the Chair whether I am in order, under rule XIV, to introduce this bill in the morning hour and ask for the first reading?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is orderly procedure of the Senate. Am I not in order, Mr. President, to ask for second reading on the same day, notwithstanding the fact that there can be objection to a second reading on the same day?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will I not be in order under the rule if on tomorrow, after an intervening day, I ask for a second reading on that day, in order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is all I need to know.

I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. KEATING. I wish to make one or two observations. First, this is a bill to amend the Civil Rights Act. There is some question in my mind as to whether this bill would go to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare or to the Committee on the Judiciary. I concede that the first title of it deals with a matter normally under the province of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. On the other hand, civil rights legislation is normally within the jurisdiction of the Committee on the Judiciary. Either of the committees, however, I believe it would be fair to say—and the distinguished minority leader has correctly characterized it—is a graveyard of this legislation; that is, either one of them as it is now constituted.

I say that without in any way impugning the motives of the Senators on those committees who feel opposed to any civil rights legislation.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that where I referred to a committee as a graveyard, that reference be expunged from the RECORD. I will not reflect upon a great Member of the Senate like the distinguished Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND]. He is, in my judgment, one of the best and most efficient and finest chairmen of a committee that we have in the Senate. He has his convictions, as I do. I would be the last in any way to reflect upon the distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL], who has accomplished so much. I ask, therefore, that my reference may be expunged from the RECORD, because I said it in a moment of vehemence. It does not suit well. It ought to come out of the RECORD.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Reserving the right to object, I do not believe any reference the Senator has made in that regard would impugn the motives of any of the Senators he has referred to, because they certainly would defeat those bills if they could. Therefore I object.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I hope my friend will not object. After all, a Member should be entitled to remove from the RECORD anything he may have said in vehemence or in emphasis.

High school students read the RECORD in their libraries. If they thought the minority leader reflected on any Member of the Senate who serves on these committees, I do not believe it would be fair to me. They would wonder what kind of person I really am. I recognize these great Senators as friendly Senators, with whom I have always had the friendliest relations, and who always work in the national interest.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. If the Senator insists on correcting his remarks, I have no objection to his doing it. He may correct them in any way he wishes. Personally I do not believe it is any reflection at all upon the Senator from Mississippi or the Senator from Alabama to say that they would oppose these bills. There may be some reflection contained in the Senator's remarks with reference to other members of the committee, in that they might not use diligence in reporting the bill, but I see no reflection at all on the chairman of either committee.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I do not want to reflect on a committee by calling it a graveyard. I am afraid we have violated the 3-minute rule. I ask unanimous consent that I may have enough time so that I may yield to other Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FONG in the chair). Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I have no objection to the request, but I would not want to have an unlimited time provided.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for an additional 10 minutes, under the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from New York.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, in the light of the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Illinois, I join in the request, and I ask that the word "graveyard" be expunged from my remarks. Although I made it clear that I was not impugning any Senator's motives and I am quite certain that the distinguished Senator from Mississippi and the distinguished Senator from Alabama would take no exception at having their respective committees referred to as graveyards of legislation, I do not wish to say anything which would seem to be unparliamentary.

The distinguished Senator from Georgia has referred to the first title of this bill, and it has been referred to elsewhere, as an FEPC bill. In fact, it is much more limited than any FEPC bill. But even if it were an FEPC bill, let us remember that an FEPC provision is contained in the Democratic platform which was adopted at Los Angeles, and that provision was not only embraced, but "warmly" embraced—those are strong words—by the candidates on the Democratic ticket. There should therefore be no objection on their part to this measure. In fact, it seems to me that they would endeavor to enact this proposed legislation to show that they are willing to perform on their promises.

Finally, I wish to commend the distinguished Senator from Illinois. All of us have a change of heart under changed circumstances. We were up against a very difficult situation here when he made his motion to table.

The distinguished Senator from Illinois has never at any time, so far as I know, departed from his principle that he favors these provisions, as the President had originally asked for them. His motion was purely a practical matter in order to bring that legislation to a head. I commend him for getting up on the summit again, which is the proper place for him.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I now yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SCOTT. There is no question that the distinguished Senator from Illinois supported the principle of both of these subjects now included in his bill. He carried the fight for the President and in favor of these items as long as he could, and then, as the Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING] has said, simply in the interest of orderly procedure and in an attempt to get a final vote and action on as much of the civil rights bill as we could get, over the opposition encountered, he took the action he did. I should like to point out that other Senators have been very active in calling for vigorous administration support. The Senator from Illinois is furnishing that now.

I refer to the majority leader's leader, who yesterday issued a statement blaming the administration for the failure of Congress to pass a stronger civil rights measure this spring. He supported the very action the Senator from Illinois is taking in regard to these two deletions, and indicated that he wanted them put back. In fact, he said:

With "vigorous"—

The word is in quotation marks—

administration support, Congress could have passed measures to authorize the Attorney General to bring court action to protect constitutional rights and to provide technical assistance to schools.

The majority leader's leader did not give us the benefit of this advice either now or at the time the bill was under discussion. He made it in reference to a demand upon him by 50 civil rights organizations for an August downpayment on the civil rights plank in his platform.

The majority leader's leader yesterday was right in calling for vigor. The majority leader's leader has vigor. It is only to be regretted that the majority leader's leader did not use some of that vigor in appearing and voting on these two measures. The first was on vote No. 272, on April 1. The gentleman involved who made this statement with respect to vigorous support did not vote then. On vote No. 273, on April 4, the same Senator did not vote. So I say if there is to be vigor here, let it be demonstrated on the floor of the Senate, when there are measures to be voted upon, rather than in statements to organizations where no legislative purpose can be served.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished senior Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I should like to obtain the floor in my own right.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Then, Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I think I have a good right to speak in this connection, because I put the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] to the pain of offering the amendment I am about to offer on a statutory basis in this particular committee, and then to move to table his own amendment. I am sorry that happened. It was inherent in the case, because we differed at that time as to whether or not it was necessary to proceed in that manner. It was done in order to get a bill. I pay my respects to the Senator from Illinois for undertaking something which was very onerous and very difficult. It may be recalled that I lost my temper here, for which I am very sorry now, and always have been since.

Having said that, I may say this to the Senator from Illinois. He is to be supported in this move with pride, because we came back to finish unfinished business. That is what this is all about. Part of the unfinished business is the civil rights bill.

The Senator from Illinois, therefore, is carrying out the mandate of the President in trying to have unfinished business completed. Civil rights is just as much unfinished business as any of the other business before the Senate. I think the Senator from Illinois can face up to it with great pride.

Rules are not made to kill legislation or to chain it. That is a misconception which some of our colleagues have. Rules are roads to fulfilling the objectives of the Constitution, namely, to vote on legislation.

Finally, I sincerely hope that politics will not be used to kill what should be done in the civil rights field by talking to us about a pallid bill. I and Senators on the other side of the aisle voted for pallid bills in 1957 and 1960, because they were the best bills we could get under the given circumstances.

I do not believe Senators on the Democratic side who favor civil rights will vote to kill any civil rights provision which with our votes could be obtained, on the ground that it might help someone politically. I do not believe they are that narrowminded. I do not believe they are so shortsighted. I will not believe it until I see it.

Certainly, the charge of politics can be hurled. But what is this all about? How will it be possible to get legislation affecting any phase of American life unless people stand up for something and then ask for it and back it?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, was my request for a second reading acted upon?

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I reserved the right to object in order that I might have the right to object.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I want to yield the floor. A minority policy meeting is being held at this minute. I yield the floor.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I have listened with great interest to the discussion which has just transpired in the Senate. I think it is not unduly egotistic of me to state that there are few more ardent advocates for civil rights in this body than I. I vigorously opposed, although unsuccessfully, various motions which the distinguished minority leader made last winter and spring to table civil rights provisions which, in my judgment, were wise, just, and overdue. I am a great advocate of FEPC legislation. Perhaps I should say I am a strong advocate; certainly I am not a great advocate of such legislation. In due course, I hope it will come before the Senate and will be passed.

But, Mr. President, I believe I can recognize the hand of politics on the floor of this body as readily as the next Senator. I do not stand alone in that field. Actually, this morning the Washington Post published an excellent editorial entitled "Not a Political Football." The editorial deals with the subject of making civil rights a political football in the Senate this week. I ask unanimous consent that the editorial may be printed at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NOT A POLITICAL FOOTBALL

The zeal of Republican Senators KEATING and SCOTT in whipping into legislative form the Democratic plank on civil rights is worthy of a better cause. Their all-too-obvious purpose is to embarrass the Democratic Party if not to provoke a filibuster that would wreck the legislative program in the brief August session. While the two Senators are pretending to launch a serious drive for new civil rights legislation, they can scarcely expect anyone to look beyond the highly partisan wrapping of their package.

In the first place, the presumption of two Republican Senators in trying to spell out what the platform of the opposition party means goes beyond the ordinary bounds of politicking. For example, the Democratic platform calls for a fair employment practices commission to secure equality in regard to job opportunities. But how should it be constituted? What powers should it have? How should its rulings or recommendations be enforced? The platform does not say. These are issues of great importance that would have to be worked out through long conferences between Senator KENNEDY and his advisers, if the Democratic ticket should be elected.

Similar problems arise from the pledge to authorize the Attorney General to institute suits for the enforcement of civil rights. As for the Keating-Scott provision for the abolition of literacy tests and poll taxes, the Senate has already passed a proposed amendment to the Constitution to wipe out poll taxes by the proper method. To press for an anti-poll-tax status of doubtful constitutionality in these circumstances is a step backward. What right have two Republican Senators to devise such strategy for their opponents?

To suppose that a bill thus concocted within a few days for partisan purposes could be transformed into law without hearings and extensive debate, is to make a jest of the legislative process. It was bad enough for Senator JAVITS to press for emergency action on an omnibus bill designed to carry out the Republican civil rights plank at the risk of jeopardizing the advanced bills on the "must list" for the August session. Messrs. KEATING and SCOTT have gone much further in the misuse of civil rights as a partisan device. Their transparent gesture is not likely to cause any serious embarrassment to the Democratic majority in the Senate, but it can embarrass the authors in all circles which look upon civil rights as a subject for painstaking legislation and not as a political football.

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. I should prefer to finish my statement, if the Senator would be agreeable to my doing so.

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. I simply wanted to make a brief comment concerning what the Senator from Pennsylvania just said.

Mr. CLARK. Very well. Without losing my right to the floor, I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Does the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania know that some great newspapers of the Scripps-Howard league, including the Washington Daily News and the Cleveland Press, published an excellent editorial entitled "Congress Go Home"? I shall read from that editorial:

CONGRESS GO HOME

Senator KENNEDY seems to have alined himself with those who are having some sober second thoughts about the post-convention session of Congress which opens Monday.

* * * * *

In New York, Senator KENNEDY cooled this off with a statement he doesn't expect the session to carry out the platform of either party. He said, in effect, that he would prefer a mandate from the people, expressed through their ballots in November.

I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania to listen to the concluding paragraph of the editorial and to inform us whether he concurs in the statement:

This is a statesmanlike view. Congress should pass the routine legislation left over from the regular session, and then go home, allowing the platforms, and the candidates, to make the issues in the campaign.

In other words, the editorial writer is saying that we should clean up the routine business and get out. Does the Senator agree with that viewpoint?

Mr. CLARK. I thank the Senator from Ohio for his helpful interjection. I certainly agree with that statement in large part. I would not want to foreclose completely any action on civil rights legislation at this short session of the Senate. I certainly do not believe that the time to bring it up is on the second day of the session. Certainly I do not believe the way to do it is to bypass the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, of which I am a member. Certainly I do not believe civil rights ought to stand in the way of the prompt enactment of proposed legislation which is on the calendar and is ready for action.

I point out that the Senate is supposedly engaged in a debate as to whether to ratify an important treaty. That treaty should have been ratified before we went to the conventions. It has been embarrassing to the administration and has been embarrassing to the Committee on Foreign Relations that the Senate was not able to act and did not act on that treaty before this time. I say let us get down to the business we were brought back here to do. Let us get on to the consideration of the treaty. Let us then move on to the consideration of the minimum wage bill. Let us get on to the education bill, the housing bill, the bill to provide health care for the aged. Let us stop politicking on subjects which are not germane to the business which we were called back to do.

I say again that I stand ready at the appropriate time to vote for the entire Democratic platform in connection with civil rights. However, I also say that any effort to do that right now is an effort to put aside the important business for which we came back, business to which we should be giving our attention at this very minute.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Is it not true that among the unfinished items which we must consider, in addition to the Antarctic Treaty, are the mutual security appropriation bill, the public works appropriation bill, and other measures of that nature? Do we not also have to consider an omnibus housing bill, a school construction bill, a minimum wage bill, a medical care for the aged bill?

Does not the Senator from Pennsylvania believe that by bringing in an extraneous issue, no matter how important it is, or how strongly one feels for or against it, the four items of unfinished business which we came back to complete encompass the civil rights field, because they take care of people regardless of race, creed, or color?

Mr. CLARK. The Senator from Montana is entirely correct. I point out also—and shall refer to this again—that, in my judgment, the rules of this body are not well conceived to accomplish the public business; that they must be drastically changed if we are to carry out our commitments; but we cannot possibly change them now, because there is not time for adequate study.

However, we can, by exercising a certain amount of self-discipline concerning the rules which are available to us get on with the pending business, which is the treaty relating to the Antarctic.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. I yield for a question only.

Mr. BUTLER. Is it a fair question to ask if the Senator's party has not come back to play the kind of politics it wants to play, and it does not want the other side to play the kind of politics it wants to play?

Mr. CLARK. That is some question.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. I now yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. I am interested in what the Senator says, and I take it very seriously.

Mr. CLARK. I am sure the Senator does. He and I have fought side by side the battle of civil rights in the past.

Mr. JAVITS. I ask this question very seriously, and I am very seriously interested in the Senator's response to it: Does the Senator regard the civil rights issue as equal in importance to the issue of medical care for the aged and the other issues the Senator says we have been brought here to deal with?

Mr. CLARK. Yes; but not at this time.

Mr. JAVITS. I am glad to have that answer.

Second, does the Senator feel that in view of the fact that we were not called back by the President, but were called back by our own resolution of adjournment, we are under any inhibition against dealing with certain matters, or that we have the latitude to deal with any matters with which we wish to deal during this short session?

Mr. CLARK. I think we have that right, and I think we must exercise some self-discipline and judgment. I regret that in this instance my judgment differs from that of the Senator from New York. I regret to state that I believe that in this instance he is wrong.

Mr. JAVITS. I appreciate the Senator's position.

Then, although our judgment as to the timing may differ, does the Senator believe that this issue is as important as anything else with which we may have to do, and that we are not under any mandate to refrain from dealing with it, except as Senators may wish?

Mr. CLARK. It is just a question of judgment or wisdom on the part of Senators.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to me?

Mr. CLARK. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Is it not a fact that no civil rights bill was reported from committee in either the House or the Senate during the entire time the Republicans controlled the Congress during President Eisenhower's administration?

Mr. CLARK. That is correct.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President——

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I have the floor. Does the Senator from Maryland desire me to yield to him for a question—for another question like the one he asked a moment ago? [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTLER. I do not wish to cut the Senator off. But I have morning hour business to transact.

Mr. CLARK. I shall finish in 30 seconds.

Mr. President, I move to lay on the table the bill introduced by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], with respect to which he has requested the second reading.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, on that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I have asked for the yeas and nays on the pending question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

So the motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was laid on the table.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I thought this would be a good opportunity to have some clarification of paragraph 3 of rule XIV. I submitted a bill with two titles to amend the Civil Rights Act. Those two titles were included in the package bill which was introduced on February 15. When I submitted this bill after an introductory statement, I asked for its first reading, and it was read by title as a first reading, as announced by the Chair.

I then requested the second reading, knowing, of course, that if there were objection to the second reading, the bill would have to lie over one legislative day.

I ask whether or not a bill at that posture is subject to a motion to table under paragraph 3 of rule XIV, which reads as follows:

> 3. No bill or joint resolution shall be committed or amended until it shall have been twice read, after which it may be referred to a committee; bills and joint resolutions introduced on leave, and bills and joint resolutions from the House of Representatives, shall be read once, and may be read twice, on the same day, if not objected to, for reference, but shall not be considered on that day nor debated, except for reference, unless by unanimous consent.

The pertinent clause is contained in the last two lines of paragraph 3, which read as follows:

> but shall not be considered on that day nor debated, except for reference, unless by unanimous consent.

It would appear to me that under this language a motion to table the bill before the Senate is violative of the rule. I think the Parliamentarian has ruled otherwise, but I should like to have a little clarification of that clause in paragraph 3 of rule XIV for my own information.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I should like to be heard very briefly on the parliamentary question, if I may.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia is recognized.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I have endeavored to make my position perfectly clear from time to time on the whole construction that has been placed upon rule XIV and the decision that one Senator, as a matter of right, may have a bill read twice and placed on the calendar, thereby bypassing the entire committee procedure of the Senate.

I believe that was a very bad precedent. I adverted to it earlier in the day when I was discussing the question that was before the Senate. If there is one thing that is completely settled under the general procedures of the Senate, it is that if a measure or a motion of any kind is in the possession of the Senate, it is there for all purposes. The distinguished Senator cannot call up his bill and ask that it be read twice, and do so for that purpose exclusively. When he does, the bill is on the desk, before the Senate, and it is in the possession of the Senate.

I well remember the ruling that was made in 1957, which set the precedent we now have, overruling an earlier precedent which had held that bills must go to committees. A very serious error was made when it was held that the end justified the means, and the committee was bypassed. A solid precedent had been established in the absence of the heat and the politics generated by a civil rights bill.

If a Senator desires to resort to this decision, which I do not think is a good precedent, he cannot do so for particular purposes. When he sends a bill to the desk and it is in the possession of the Senate, it becomes as much the property of every other Senator as it is of the Senator who submitted it, and any motion that is in order at any other time may be made with respect to the bill.

The Senator asked unanimous consent that the bill be read a second time. It was called up for that purpose. I reserved an objection. There was considerable discussion, and while the bill was in the possession of the Senate a motion was made to lay it on the table. Unanimous consent was granted for lengthy debate, but the gravamen of the whole parliamentary situation is the fact that the bill was called up and put into the possession of the Senate. No Senator can introduce a bill merely for his own personal purposes and for the purpose of doing what he desires to have done with it. When he sends it to the desk and the clerk has physical custody of the bill, any motion can be made with respect to it as can be made with respect to any other bill.

I deplore this whole precedent, this whole system of bypassing a committee. Undoubtedly under the precedent as it stands today, ill conceived as it is, when the bill was before the Senate, after having been called up by the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], any motion that might be made under rule XXII could have been made. A motion could have been made to lay on the table. A motion to postpone indefinitely could have been made. A motion to refer the bill to committee could have been made.

When the Senate was prevailed upon in 1957 to strike down a precedent of many years standing, to permit the bypassing of committees, it was argued that the majority of the Senate ought to have a right to work its will under all circumstances. I do not agree with that philosophy. I think there are procedures that are above the will of the majority, and we cannot protect the rights of the minority unless we have procedures that are superior to the will of the majority.

In this case, when the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] called up his bill and asked for the second reading, the bill was in the custody of the Senate, and the majority of the Senate had the right to work its will and lay the bill on the table. They have done so.

In my opinion the Senator's point of order is moot. It should have been lodged before.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I did not make a point of order. I am fully aware that the question is moot. I made it abundantly clear in my preliminary observations that the request was wholly for information and for future use. The pertinent language involved is, first, that the bill shall be read once.

Second, under the rule, the bill may be read twice. Then this language appears: "But shall not be considered on that day." What constitutes consideration? We have not discussed the merits of the bill. Much of this was preliminary, and much of it was general discussion, but the question is, Was it considered on the same day by virtue of a motion to table? I think that ought to be clarified, quite aside from whether it was read once or whether it was read twice.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator will concede that if he had gotten unanimous consent to consider the bill, the motion could have been made to lay it on the table, even though it had been read one time.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes. Then of course it would definitely have been before the Senate. But there was no unanimous-consent request to have the bill before the Senate.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator asked unanimous consent to have the bill read the second time.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I did it as a matter of right, not as a matter of unanimous consent.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator did it, but he was not entitled to it.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I was entitled under rule XIV to ask for first reading by title. I ask for a ruling on whether or not I was, as a matter of right, entitled to submit the bill in the morning hour and ask for first reading by title.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator went further. He asked that it be read the second time. That put the bill in the custody of the Senate. He could only have it read the second time by unanimous consent.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The pertinent sentence is: "But shall not be considered on that day." So there was the language. I ask only for information in case a comparable situation arises at some future time.

Mr. RUSSELL. That language can be dispensed with by unanimous consent, and the Senator from Illinois sought to dispense with it by unanimous consent.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I wish to make a very brief statement about the vote I cast in opposition to the motion to lay on the table the Dirksen civil rights proposal. No one should be surprised by my vote, in view of the position I have taken previously on just such parliamentary procedure policies the Clark motion to lay on the table raised. I think the Clark motion was a very unsound approach to the procedural problem raised by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

The Senator from Georgia is unanswerably correct in the parliamentary analysis he has presented to the Senate. We created the problem with regard to rule XIV in 1957. There were a few of us who thought at that time that we were making a mistake in the Senate when rule XIV was subjected to the interpretation and the treatment it received. Some of us took the position at that time that we should not be parties to the type of interpretation of rule XIV that was made. The record is perfectly clear. The Senator from Georgia and the Senator from Oregon in 1957 sought, in effect, time after time in the debate, to indicate that this matter would rise to plague us. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STENNIS] took the same position, if my recollection is correct.

I took the position at that time that the most orderly procedure in the Senate by which to handle this problem was to refer the matter to a Senate committee. I voted against the motion to lay on the table the civil rights issue today for exactly the same reason that I urged in 1957 that the House civil rights bill should go to the Senate Judiciary Committee. Once again, in my judgment, we should have awaited our time today and eventually committed the proposal of the Senator from Illinois to committee. After all, it is the committee procedure of the Senate that gives us the most orderly consideration of these matters.

We all know that the political humidity is very high these days. We must expect many political thunder and verbal election storms in this session of Congress. I believe we ought to have waited out the politics on this civil rights issue for a few hours. This bill would have had to be read automatically a second time tomorrow. That would have placed us in the parliamentary position so that we could have moved tomorrow to send it to committee. By adopting the Clark motion to lay it on the table we have caused much confusion among many people who are concerned about civil rights.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. Referring this civil rights issue to committee rather than moving to lay it on the table is exactly the course of action I think we ought to have taken. I now yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLARK. Is it not true that a motion to refer a bill to a committee under the present rule of the Senate, of which I disapprove, would be subject to unlimited debate?

Mr. MORSE. Unlimited debate never bothers me. If people want to resort to that parliamentary tactic on civil rights legislation, let us smoke them out. To use a colloquialism, if the gentlemen on the other side want to adopt that maneuver let them try it. We ought to put an end to it. We should not take a civil rights issue that has been raised by the party of opposition, and table it. We should meet them head on under the rules of the Senate that are available to us. We could have them tomorrow on a motion to send their civil rights proposal to committee, where the bill ought to go for such consideration as the committee wants to give it.

Mr. CLARK. It is rare indeed that I find myself in opposition to my good friend from Oregon, particularly with respect to the matter of civil rights. However, in my considered judgment, if we had had unlimited debate, the public business of the Senate for which we were called back would have been delayed. It was for that reason that I made my motion. I have no regrets. I regret only that my judgment is not in accord with that of my good friend from Oregon.

Mr. MORSE. I wish to say most respectfully that I do not know of anything that could be more in the interest of public business than to have the Senate proceed to demonstrate to the country that it wants civil rights legislation to receive full and fair consideration by a Senate committee. I do not share the fears of the Senator from Pennsylvania. I say we did not make use of the most orderly procedure under the rules for handling this civil rights problem today. We should have waited our time until tomorrow and sent this matter to committee.

I have one more thing to say with regard to my position. I am not taking the position that in the short 3 weeks ahead of us we should try to pass comprehensive civil rights legislation. I do not think it is very realistic for any of us to assume that passing an adequate civil rights bill is a parliamentary possibility in the Senate during this short session.

The people of the country are going to see through the politics of anyone who wants to make a partisan political maneuver on civil rights legislation during this short session of the Congress.

I yield to no one in the light of the record I have made on civil rights during my 16 years in the Senate. I shall always be proud of the fact that I stood with the Senator from Georgia in 1957 on the parliamentary position he took on rule XIV. We were right then and we are right again today in our criticism of the interpretation of rule XIV as it was made in 1957 and applied again today.

I hope that when we come back in January we will see the importance of sending to the Committee on Rules and Administration a revision of rule XIV, so that we can get this matter cleared up once and for all. If we do not do so, periodically we are going to come back to exactly the same position in which we find ourselves today. The trouble is with rule XIV as well as rule XXII. An end justifies the means argument created this problem in 1957 when the civil rights bill that came over from the House was not sent to the Senate Judiciary Committee but was placed by the Senate directly on the Senate Calendar. If we change the rules we will have Senators rise from time to time to move to table a civil rights issue just as has been done today when what we ought to do is send it to committee. Our action today will be subject to a great deal of misinterpretation by a great many people in the country.

I voted against the motion to lay on the table the civil rights issue because I did not think it was the most orderly procedure to adopt.

THE LENDING POWERS OF BANKS

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HRUSKA in the chair). The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I observe in this morning's New York Times that the Federal Reserve Board has acted to loosen the strings on the banks' lending power. I ask unanimous consent that an article on this subject appearing in the New York Times be printed in the RECORD at this point. I hope that Senators will take the time to read the article.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEDERAL RESERVE ACTS TO LOOSEN STRINGS ON BANKS' LENDING POWER

(By Joseph A. Loftus)

WASHINGTON, August 8.—Some of the strings on the lending powers of banks will be loosened within the next 25 days.

Action announced by the Federal Reserve System today could theoretically increase the lending power of banks by as much as $3,600 million.

This is about twice as much as the increase that was permitted to develop in the second half of 1959 and, therefore, has the appearance of a significant change in money policy.

Qualified sources said, however, that there was no intent in today's action to make any significant change in policy. The intent was to comply with a 1959 law and to do so at a time when rising seasonal demand for credit would offset the additional reserves that will be allowed to expand bank credit.

If the Federal Reserve has picked the wrong time and if the expected seasonal rise in credit demand does not materialize, the Reserve System will have to absorb the excess by open-market operations—that is, by selling securities—these sources said. There is no intent to affect the whole area of interest rates, it was declared.

The action was taken in the form of amendments to Regulation D. These amendments relate to bank reserves and reserve requirements in three respects. They further implement the 1959 law relating to vault cash and reserve requirements.

The changes are as follows:

1. Effective August 25, member banks outside of central Reserve and Reserve cities, known as country banks, will be permitted to count, in meeting their reserve requirements, any vault cash that they hold in excess of 2½ percent of their net demand (checking account) deposits. At present they can count only vault cash that they hold in excess of 4 percent of net demand deposits.

2. Effective September 1, Reserve city and central Reserve city banks will be permitted to count vault cash in excess of 1 percent of their net demand deposits, instead of the present 2 percent.

3. Effective September 1, the reserves required to be held by central Reserve city banks against their net demand deposits, now 18 percent, will be reduced to 17½ percent. This change is a first step toward compliance with a provision of the 1959 act that the differential between the requirements of central Reserve city and Reserve city banks be eliminated by July 28, 1962. Banks in Reserve cities is now 16½ percent, the present action reduces the differential from 1½ percentage points to 1 point.

CATEGORIES LISTED

The central Reserve cities are New York and Chicago. The Reserve cities are the other larger cities of the country, numbering about 50. Banks outside these cities have come to be called country banks.

As a result of the first two changes, it is estimated that about four-fifths of the 6,200 member banks will be in a position to count a part of their vault cash in meeting their required reserves.

The amount of reserves made available by today's actions on vault cash will be about $470 million, of which somewhat more than half will be at country banks and almost all of the rest at Reserve city banks.

The reduction in the reserves required to be held by central Reserve city banks will release about $120 million of reserves.

Since banks may lend roughly $6 for every $1 of reserves, lending power theoretically would be raised about $3,600 million. Authorities say, however, that theoretical calculations do not always work out as they do on paper because of factors that cannot be anticipated or measured.

Normally, there is a rise in demand for business credit in the fall as merchants, for instance, get ready to stock their shelves for the Christmas rush. In the past, the Federal Reserve System generally has provided for seasonal rises in demand for credit by buying securities in the open market.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, another matter suggested by that article, is the question of the so-called tight-money policy or hard-money policy which has been mentioned in the platform of the opposing party, and repeatedly discussed on the floor of the Senate by Members of the opposing party.

A recent study of the question of money rates around the world has been made by the First National City Bank of New York. The Wall Street Journal of today, August 9, in an editorial entitled "The High Price of Cheap Money," comments on this study as follows:

It shows, first off, that the current 4 percent prime rate in the United States for borrowed money is the lowest in the world. In Great Britain, for example, the best borrowers pay as much as 7½ percent. In France, 7¼ percent. In Japan, 9 percent.

Indeed, in only two countries in the world does the prime rate even approach the low level of the United States. Those countries are Portugal and Switzerland.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the editorial from which I have read, in part, be printed at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE HIGH PRICE OF CHEAP MONEY

The Democrats are deploring the high interest rates which people today have to pay when they borrow—all due, naturally, to the Eisenhower hard money policy—and one of the boons they promise us, if elected, is cheap money.

Well, the First National City Bank of New York has just compiled a table showing interest rates around the world. It gives the rate for prime commercial loans, which is the cheapest money that can be borrowed by the biggest and best firms. The man who walks into a bank to borrow for his personal use will pay much more. And the table makes very interesting reading indeed.

It shows, first off, that the current 4 percent prime rate in the United States for borrowed money is the lowest in the world. In Great Britain, for example, the best borrowers pay as much as 7½ percent. In France, 7¼ percent. In Japan, 9 percent. There is no place where you can borrow money cheaper than right here.

Indeed, there are only two countries where the current prime rate even approaches the low level of the United States. These two—and we hope Senator KENNEDY will take note—are both hard money countries. The rate in Portugal is 4 percent, as here, and in Switzerland 4½ percent.

Mr. KENNEDY might also note that in the countries that have gone further in a socialistic planned economy, complete with welfare state, borrowed money is considerably more expensive than under our alleged high rates. In Norway the biggest and soundest borrowers pay 5½ percent; in Sweden 6½ percent.

But what really sends a chill down the spine is a look at the soaring prices for borrowed money in those countries which have deliberately, and diligently, followed cheap money policies. In Brazil and Paraguay the cheapest you can borrow is 12 percent. In Peru the best commercial loans cost 13½ percent. And in Chile the lowest rate is 15 percent.

These, mind you, are for loans on the best business security. The man who wants to borrow to buy a house or pay a hospital bill must pay 20 percent and up, if he can borrow at all. For once everyone realizes that a government is deliberately going to cheapen the money, interest rates soar in a desperate effort to keep up with the inflation.

So the moral in this little tour of the world, if it needs to be stated, is that for the people cheap money is the most expensive of all.

JUDGESHIPS

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senate to a statement made yesterday by the distinguished majority leader. I should like to have his attention. He was speaking with respect to a bill to provide for new judgeships. He said:

I am sure we can pass a bill to create new judgeships. Such a bill has been reported. It may not go as far as some persons want it to go, because there are certain patronage considerations which we do not want to go into.

Mr. President, in New York, especially, we are under great pressure with respect to judgeships. I should like to state to the distinguished Senator from Texas that I sincerely hope that whatever may be the patronage pressures, certainly any Senator from any one of the States can control that as much as anyone. However, this bill should be brought up. I repeat that we in the State of New York are under tremendous pressure to provide additional judgeships.

For example, in the southern district of New York the judges carry the heaviest caseload in the country, an average of 633 cases per judge.

As of March 31 of this year, in the eastern district of New York, the judges were carrying a load of 306 cases per judge, which is 21 percent higher than the national average of 252 cases per judge.

It still takes about 4 years for a civil case to move from start to finish, which is almost three times the average of 15.3 months for the Nation. That is in the eastern district of New York.

Mr. President, in that connection, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD an editorial entitled "More Judges; Better Justice," published in the Christian Science Monitor of June 8, 1960. The editorial deals with this subject.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MORE JUDGES; BETTER JUSTICE

After more than 5 years of delay since the last such authorization, the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives has approved a bill which would create badly needed additional judgeships to relieve congestion in Federal courts.

The Judicial Conference, representing all the Federal tribunals, recommended addition of more than 50 new judges in order to handle a growing caseload. This has been endorsed by the Department of Justice and the President.

The legislation now apparently headed for action in the lower house of Congress would provide only 35 of this number. But it would help to relieve a condition that has resulted in severe delays of justice especially in New York, Philadelphia, and other metropolitan areas. A bill to provide for 25 new judges was reported by the Senate Judiciary Committee last year but awaits a place on the calendar.

Much of this dilatory record is due to friction between a Democratic Congress and the administration over creation of appointments to be made by a Republican President. Only a few of the vacancies could be filled during the remainder of the Eisenhower term, and Attorney General William P. Rogers has pledged that half these seats will be given to Democrats. Bipartisanship in such appointments should become the rule under whatever administration.

Allowing time for the slow process of selection and confirmation of nominees for the bench, the delay in bringing the Federal judiciary up toward a reasonable minimum in manpower will at best be serious. Congress should certainly make a bill for new judgeships a matter of must legislation before adjournment.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, in the House of Representatives a bill has been reported which provides for 35 new judges. One such judge would be assigned to the eastern district of New York. The southern district of New York would receive three of the new judges, and the Second Circuit Court of Appeals would receive one.

My colleague from New York [Mr. KEATING] and I have proposed that the Second Circuit Court of Appeals get one additional judge, the eastern district of New York two, and the southern district of New York four. It seems to me that the House bill is so very close to what we have in mind that this matter should be acted on now as a fair compromise.

I point out also that the Judicial Conference has recommended 50 judges, and that the President yesterday, in sending his message to Congress, urged that we act upon this matter as greatly important, unfinished business, so as to provide more judges.

I conclude upon this point: I know of practically no matter, other than the subject of war and peace, which intrudes so personally upon the lives of the citizens as the inability to get justice in time. We lawyers know that, very often, justice deferred is justice denied. I know of no matter which impinges upon the lives of individuals so intimately as that.

In view of the encouragement given by the majority leader in his statement of yesterday, I hope that thoughts of patronage, which are completely under control, will be laid aside, and that we may have action at this session on a judgeship bill such as that which has been reported by the House Committee on the Judiciary.

CIVIL RIGHTS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, may we have a ruling on the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania that the bill be laid on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HRUSKA in the chair). The Chair is about to rule.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, before the Chair rules, I should like to make a brief remark on the question of the interpretation of the rule. I call the attention of the Presiding Officer to Senate Procedure, page 106, the third paragraph:

> Bills when introduced are read twice before their reference to the appropriate committees, and a motion to place a bill on the calendar or to refer it to a committee is not in order until it has had its second reading.

Under rule XXII, when a question is pending, no motion shall be received but, among other things, to lay on the table.

As I understand the situation, the bill has been read once, an objection was made to it, so that the objection had to go over to the second day. If it is not in order to make a motion to refer it to committee, if it is not in order to make a motion to place the bill on the calendar on the first reading of the bill, what question is before the Senate?

Why is there any question before us that can be the subject of a motion to lay on the table? The only argument is that the whole bill is before the Senate for its consideration, but it is not before the Senate for its consideration on the first day, when it has been read once.

I call that to the attention of the Presiding Officer, because it does not seem to me, in logic, that any question is pending before the Senate on which a motion to lay on the table can be made.

I say this most sincerely, as a parliamentary matter, not to raise any question on the merits or demerits of the matter pending before the Senate. However, if a motion cannot be made to refer a bill to a committee, and if a motion cannot be made to place a bill on the calendar, what question is before the Senate on which a motion to lay on the table can be made?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The bill itself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair rules as follows: Rule XXII, paragraph 1, provides:

> When a question is pending, no motion shall be received but—

Then certain motions are enumerated, including a motion to lay on the table.

The Chair held that a motion to lay on the table was under rule XXII, not under rule XIV, and was therefore in order.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, has this question been disposed of?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Rhode Island bear with me for 30 seconds?

While the minority policy committee was in session downstairs, and in the colloquy which ensued on the floor, the majority leader made this statement—and I hope he will correct me if I am in error:

> While we have had two rollcalls, I think they are legitimately absent, but I do move that the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate, in view of their great interest in this matter, be instructed to request the attendance of the minority.

The rule provides for an instruction to the Sergeant at Arms to require the attendance of absent Senators, not the minority.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I shall be glad to correct that statement. As I viewed the situation at that time, only three or four Members of the minority were on the floor. The bill was a minority bill. The minority had an unusual interest in it. I wanted to be certain that the minority leader and all his colleagues were adequately informed, because there had been two rollcalls, and they had not responded. I felt that I should make it abundantly clear that we were about to have a yea-and-nay vote on the motion to table.

If in any way it is felt that this language is offensive, I will suggest that it be changed so as to read that the minority and majority Members of the Senate be informed. However, the majority had some 40 of its Members present at the time. We had called each one of them personally on the telephone. I had suggested earlier that the minority Senators be present, so that the vote would not be delayed.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The minority Members of the Senate were only 200 feet away from the Chamber. The rule is the rule.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, I have the floor.

Mr. DIRKSEN. All right. I will let the language stand for what it is.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have the language changed.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island is recognized.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PASTORE. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I should like to have the attention of the Senator from Illinois. I ask that the language in question, which relates to the minority being requested to attend the session of the Senate, be modified so as to provide that the Sergeant at Arms request the attendance of all absent Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is that a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

THE ANTARCTIC TREATY

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock has arrived, and the morning hour is concluded.

The Chair lays before the Senate the pending Antarctic Treaty, which will be stated by title.

The CHIEF CLERK. Executive B, 86th Congress, 2d session, the Antarctic Treaty, signed at Washington on December 1, 1959.

LIMITATION OF TERM "WATERPROOF" WHEN APPLIED TO COTTON CLOTH OR FABRIC

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to limit the term "waterproof" when applied to cotton cloth fabric. The purpose for my introducing this bill is to implement an urgent appeal for relief made to me by Mr. Gordon Osborne, president and treasurer of the Warwick Mills, of West Warwick, R.I.

I have a letter under date of August 4 from Mr. Osborne which explains the situation quite thoroughly, and which I shall read into the RECORD at this point as part of my remarks:

> WARWICK MILLS,
> West Warwick, R.I., August 4, 1960.
> The Honorable JOHN O. PASTORE, > Providence, R.I.
> DEAR SENATOR PASTORE: Warwick Mills was founded in 1896, and has operated in the town of West Warwick ever since. It has approximately 16,000 spindles and employs 250 people. We specialize in spinning and weaving fine combed cotton yarns for industrial uses, such as filter fabrics, pump diaphragms, airplane wing fabric, billing and typewriter ribbon cloth, and balloon and dirigible fabrics. As a matter of fact, from the time we made the balloon cloth that set the world's altitude record for the U.S. Air Force in 1935, we have made every yard of fabric for the Navy's lighter-than-air program. No other mill in America or abroad has been able to meet these exacting specifications.
> Typewriter ribbon fabric is a very difficult product to make. It accounts for almost 50 percent of our production and this output is almost 50 percent of the total of all domestic typewriter ribbon cloths. In fact, there are only two other mills today besides Warwick which make this fabric.

Until recently, Warwick Mills had enjoyed a long-term period of this successful operation. Since I became a member of the staff in 1933, we have had profitable operations in each and every year except the last 2 years. The mill has a reputation for steady and continuous operation, and over 80 percent of our employees have been with us for 10 years or longer. The impact of imports of foreign typewriter cloth have been increasingly severe, and for the last 3 years we have operated our type division at a serious financial loss. Not only have these imports increased each year, but the price at which they are sold has decreased. If we are not able to operate our typewriter ribbon production at a reasonable profit, we would be in an untenable situation. The unanimous recommendation of the Tariff Commission will tend to rectify this predicament when it is approved and effective. However, should the determination of the Customs appraisers that grey typewriter ribbon fabric be classified as "waterproof" (sec. 907) with its drastically lower duty remain so, the future of Warwick Mills will be indeed grim, and can only lead to its liquidation or bankruptcy.

Warwick Mills is one of the few remaining cotton spinning and weaving mills in Rhode Island, and as a unique organization—with unequaled skill and knowledge—is well worth saving. Your sympathy, understanding, and help will be most appreciated.

I am enclosing a copy of my testimony before the Tariff Commission in April of this year.

Yours sincerely,

GORDON OSBORNE,
President and Treasurer.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the testimony referred to be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF GORDON OSBORNE, PRESIDENT OF WARWICK MILLS, BEFORE THE TARIFF COMMISSION AT ITS HEARING RE COTTON TYPEWRITER RIBBON CLOTH ON APRIL 20, 1960

My name is Gordon Osborne. I am the president of Warwick Mills, a 17,000-spindle cotton mill founded in 1896 and located in West Warwick, R.I. We employ about 250 persons.

Our mill produces fine combed cotton textiles exclusively and specializes in the production of industrial fabrics. The mill has been producing these special fabrics for about 40 years. At one time it also made some fine combed apparel fabric, but in the last 20 years production has been concentrated on mechanical fabrics made to rigid specifications.

Of these mechanical fabrics, one of the first, and by far the most important, was, and is, typewriter ribbon cloth. This fabric today comprises approximately 50 percent of the total production of our mill—whether measured by machinery employed, pounds of cotton and man-hours of labor expended, dollars of cost or sales volume; in fact, by every criterion but profitability.

Our typewriter ribbon fabric is sold by our agents, Wellington Sears Co., Inc., to concerns who use the fabric in the manufacture of ribbons not only for typewriters, but for all kinds of business machines and computers.

The layout of the machinery at Warwick Mills, the training of its labor force, and all other aspects of its production organization are designed and fitted for the production of high count, lightweight industrial fabrics. When I say that the layout of the machinery at Warwick is designed for the production of such fabrics I mean that the 300 or so looms which we have at the mill are all employed in weaving such fabrics, and that the preparatory work of picking, carding, drawing, spinning, and slashing which are performed in our fully integrated mill require, as a practical matter, that all of these looms be engaged in making fine woven fabrics having many common properties of weight and construction. With this specialization it is not practical to convert half of the mill to the production of other lines of fabrics or to other purposes.

Nor can Warwick suspend or even curtail the typewriter ribbon cloth part of its production and continue to operate. A mill of Warwick's size must operate on a full three-shift basis to absorb its fixed costs and to maintain the high quality necessary to sell in the highly competitive field of mechanical and industrial fine fabrics. If one section of the mill is shut down or curtailed it affects the efficiency and quality of all lines of the mill's production.

Because of these characteristics of our mill, it is essential that it be able to continue the production of its present volume of typewriter ribbon cloth; but from an economic point of view, this cannot be done unless the production of typewriter ribbon cloth can be made profitable. Therefore, this investigation is of the gravest importance to us.

Warwick produces a substantial part of the typewriter ribbon cloth produced in the United States (last year about 45 percent), and that suspension of its production of typewriter ribbon cloth would have the effect of depriving the country of an important part of the domestic capacity for the production of this material. This capacity could be replaced in times of national emergency only with the greatest difficulty.

I became a member of the staff of Warwick Mills in 1933 and have been continuously employed by Warwick ever since. I know that from 1933 through 1957 this mill returned a net profit after all charges in every year. In 1958, however, the mill showed a serious operating loss, and it also operated at a loss in 1959.

Prior to 1955, as far back as our records go, our typewriter ribbon fabrics—produced by what is generally considered a highly efficient and scientific process—sold at a profit. Warwick began to lose money on typewriter ribbon fabrics in 1956 and all years since then have been unprofitable so far as these products are concerned.

During the same period—1956 through 1959 (with the exception of 1958 when the sharp drop in cotton prices resulted in serious inventory losses)—profit trends on all other products of Warwick Mills, taken together, were static or rising. Nevertheless, the profits on these other products have not been sufficient to keep Warwick Mills from becoming a net loss operation. We have now reached the point where these losses are eating into the mill's capital.

Since 1955, we have experienced increasing competition from imported typewriter ribbon fabrics. We have felt this competition not only in the form of reduced prices and other financial concessions granted by the sellers of these foreign fabrics, but also in the increased volume of imports.

When the first serious effects of foreign competition became evident, we decided to hold the prices of our goods at a level which would allow us at least to break even on production costs. We found, however, that this resulted in diminishing sales and in rapid increases in our inventory. In the space of 3 years from October 31, 1955, to October 31, 1958, our inventory of typewriter ribbon cloth rose from 114,987 square yards to 830,569 square yards (more than 700 percent), in spite of the fact that our prices of typewriter ribbon cloth (both grey and finished) remained substantially constant from the beginning of 1955 through the beginning of 1957 and declined by about 5 cents a yard from February 1, 1957, to October 1, 1958.

In view of this alarming state of affairs, we changed our policy late in 1957 and have since then followed a policy of balancing sales against production in order to maintain production and reduce our inventories to a reasonable level. To do this, we have found it necessary steadily and constantly to reduce the prices of our typewriter ribbon fabrics. For instance, our price reached a low point in 1959 of 62.5 cents a yard for 270 count finished cloth which was down 8.75 cents from our price in the last quarter of 1956. The declines in other grades of cloth, both grey and finished, were equally sharp. This trend in prices has not changed.

As a result of this program of meeting the foreign competition (and assuredly it is foreign competition, for our domestic competitors have not forced prices down) we have been successful in keeping our mill in full operation, and in retaining our skilled workers. Volume has not, however, meant profits; the operations both of our typewriter ribbon cloth line taken alone and, because of typewriter ribbon cloth, of the entire mill, have been conducted at a loss during both of the past 2 years. As I am sure you are aware, this has not been the overall experience of the cotton textile industry in the past year. The unhappy situation of the producers of typewriter ribbon cloth cannot be attributed to any general or textile business recession. We are suffering from the pressures of low-priced imports.

From a production point of view typewriter ribbon fabrics are the most stable fabric Warwick Mills makes. It has been the practice of the mill to put approximately half of its looms on various constructions of typewriter ribbon cloth, and to run these looms steadily (as a group) for long periods of time (the only change being from construction to construction). As this amounts to approximately half of the mill's output, it has been a stabilizing factor of real importance. It avoids the cost of constant loom changing, gives high efficiency of production with a minimum of rejects or seconds, and has enabled us to plan production, inventories, raw material requirements, and the supervision of our work force with maximum advantage.

The other fabrics which Warwick makes, such as lightweight aeronautical fabrics and fine filter cloths for the chemical industry, are so specialized that were we forced to suspend typewriter ribbon cloth production there is no prospect of increasing our sales and output of these other fabrics to the extent necessary to make use of the equipment and workmen now employed in the making of typewriter ribbon cloth. Nor are there other fabrics, which our mill would be fitted to produce, to which we could turn. Our ability, therefore, to manufacture and sell typewriter ribbon fabrics at a reasonable profit is the most important single element in respect to the future of the mill and its continuing operation. Without a reasonable assurance of such ability it is doubtful if Warwick Mills can continue to operate.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, it is quite evident that the practice that has been employed by foreign manufacturers of this cloth is purely and simply a subterfuge in contravention of the true intent of the tariff law insofar as waterproofed materials are concerned, and constitutes a loophole which I feel should be closed, and closed promptly.

The time might well come when the facilities of the Warwick Mills with regard to the production of this and other very fine cloth which is used in our national defense would no longer be available to us, if the prediction made by Mr. Osborne in his letter were to come true and if the Warwick Mills were forced to close. In addition to the disastrous result to our national defense, 250 jobs would be eliminated in my State, which can ill afford this further blow to its economy.

The incongruity of the situation is that this type of unfinished typewriter-ribbon cloth is being classified as "waterproof cloth" and comes under a very low tariff of 11 percent, as against 20 to 32 percent ad valorem, when the real purpose of this cloth is to be absorbent, not waterproof, in order to be used as typewriter ribbon. Everyone knows that typewriter ribbon is used to absorb ink, not to repel it. Yet these foreign manufacturers are making it into waterproof material, in order to come under the low tariff; and once it gets into our country, the repellent has to be washed off, in order to make the cloth absorbent. Yet through the employment of this loophole, these foreign manufacturers are able to perpetrate this subterfuge, very much to the detriment of our own domestic manufacturers.

Let me say that the cotton typewriter-ribbon cloth industry has been severely damaged in recent years by an increase in imports, which in 1959 alone greatly exceeded the domestic production of this cloth. What is important is that the U.S. Tariff Commission, after thorough investigation and public hearings, found that typewriter-ribbon cloth, to quote the Commission, "is being imported in such increased quantities—as to cause serious injury to the domestic industry," and, further, that it is necessary to increase the duties. The Commission then recommended that the tariff concessions granted in GATT be withdrawn. I may add that the Commission's findings and recommendations on this score were unanimous.

I am very happy to observe that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BUSH] is lending a very attentive ear, because there are two of these mills in his State of Connecticut.

My intense interest in this matter, Mr. President, lies in the fact that typewriter-ribbon cloth used in typewriters and other business machines is produced in two mills in Connecticut, one in Rhode Island, and two in South Carolina.

I may add that imports come principally from England and Holland, with Japan in third place. U.S. production of cotton typewriter-ribbon cloth has dropped from 5,800,000 square yards in 1955 to 2,911,000 square yards in 1959, a decline of 42 percent. On the other hand, imports of cotton typewriter-ribbon cloth in 1959 amounted to 4,931,000 square yards, or 169 percent of domestic production. The prices for U.S. typewriter-ribbon cloth have declined steadily since 1957, employment has fallen off, and the domestic producers as a group have suffered losses for the last 3 years.

The reason for this bill is precisely this: After the hearings, and when the findings of the Commission were made public, it was disclosed for the first time that henceforth customs appraisers will treat "unfinished cotton typewriter-ribbon cloth" as "waterproof cloth" and will permit it to be imported under paragraph 907, rather than under paragraph 904, of the tariff law. This means that the present inadequate duties—and, I repeat, the present duties are inadequate—of from 20 to 32 percent of ad valorem will be reduced to 11 percent, and the recommended increase in duties of 28 to 48 percent ad valorem will not be applied to unfinished cloth.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Rhode Island yield?

Mr. PASTORE. I yield.

Mr. BUSH. I am very glad the Senator from Rhode Island has brought up this question today. The industry concerned is not an extremely large one; in fact, it is relatively small. So I do not think that giving it a fair deal will greatly influence our balance of exports over imports, or vice versa. But this is a very important matter to certain areas to which the Senator from Rhode Island has so carefully referred.

Mr. PASTORE. Let it be understood that the industry is a very important one, although at the present time it is not a large industry. But, after all, these are the only concerns in the United States which manufacture very, very fine fabric products which are used in balloons and for airplanes and parachutes. If this industry is put out of business, who knows what harm may be caused to the security of our country?

Mr. BUSH. The Senator from Rhode Island is absolutely correct. I did not mean to minimize the importance of the situation insofar as this industry is concerned. I only have in mind that it is fortunate that in this case the industry is not a gigantic one, such as some others.

Mr. PASTORE. Such as General Motors.

Mr. BUSH. Yes, or the automobile industry.

Mr. PASTORE. Yes.

Mr. BUSH. I say this because I think the President, in reaching his decision, should be influenced by the fact that this is a relatively small matter in connection with the exports and imports of this country, but is vital for the reasons the Senator from Rhode Island has so ably pointed out.

I wish to say to the Senator from Rhode Island that only yesterday I cooperated with the industry—as no doubt he has—in arranging appointments for representatives of the industry to call on the executive offices, including the White House, and on the Secretary of Commerce, in order that they may make their plea to the President and to his advisers that the action by the Tariff Commission in this matter be sustained by him.

Mr. PASTORE. That is a very desirable step, and I shall lend my support, in any way I can, to any action that my distinguished colleague from Connecticut feels is desirable in trying to get this matter straightened out on the administrative or executive level, as we have done with respect to cotton and woolen goods. I want to compliment my colleague from Connecticut for the excellent work he has done within this area in protecting the textile industry of the United States of America. But in this case I think we are up against this difficulty: The Customs Bureau has made a ruling as to what is waterproof or is not waterproof. If cloth is waterproof, it comes in under a 11-percent tariff. If it is not waterproof, it comes in under a tariff between 20 and 32 percent. Certain manufacturers are making this cloth, which is really absorbent, into waterproof cloth so it can get into this country under a smaller tariff. Then when the cloth is here, they wash off the waterproofing. If that is not a loophole, I have never heard of a loophole.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. PASTORE. In just a moment. We are actually encouraging our friends abroad to become deceitful; and it is wrong. If a cloth is to be absorbent, why do they have to make it waterproof and then, when it gets here, wash the waterproofing off? How ridiculous can we become?

Mr. BUSH. I fully agree with what the Senator from Rhode Island has said. I wish to ask him a question. Is this determination of whether a cloth is waterproof or not waterproof a ruling of the Tariff Commission or of the Internal Revenue Bureau?

Mr. PASTORE. It is by the Customs Bureau of the Treasury Department.

Mr. BUSH. It was not a ruling of the Tariff Commission?

Mr. PASTORE. It was determined by the Court of Customs, because there is some formula by which the cloth is deposited in a receptable containing water, the so-called cup test, and if the water does not go through the cloth it is deemed to be waterproof. I suppose there are a thousand different ways of killing a pig. These people are employing intrigue and deceit in order to subvert the purpose of the law. All we are doing by this amendment is saying the ultimate objective of the cloth—its end use—should determine whether or not it should be admitted as waterproof. In other words, if it is to be used for making a tent, it ought to be termed "waterproof." If it is to be used for a raincoat, it ought to be termed "waterproof." But if it is to be used as a "blotter," it should not be made waterproof first, and then, after the cloth gets into the country, washed out and used as a "blotter."

Mr. BUSH. I believe this is a ruling which has been made by the Collector of Customs. I think it is an unfortunate ruling. I want to add my voice of protest to that of the Senator from Rhode Island that this kind of ruling can be made. It is unfortunate that this kind of subterfuge can be resorted to by someone down the line in the Government, in the collector's office. I heartily join with the Senator from Rhode Island in this protest.

Mr. PASTORE. I thank my distinguished colleague from Connecticut. This is not the end of it. I only hope this proposal will go before the appropriate committee. I understand Representative MILLS has already introduced a bill on this subject in the House. My bill is comparable to it. There has been some indication there will be consideration of it during this extraordinary session, but, if the matter is not considered, I would hope we would append the proposal to some pending legislation, or possibly work on it the first of next year. However, what I am seeking to demonstrate is that we should rectify our tariff laws so we do not make "Philadelphia lawyers" out of friends all over the world, trying to find ways and means of subverting the law—and I say that with due respect to my colleague from Philadelphia. [Laughter.]

In other words, let us not encourage our friends to contravene the intent of our law by finding ways and means, through loopholes and subterfuge, to defeat the very purpose of the law. If it is waterproof cloth, let us say so, and have it come in under the waterproof cloth categories. If it is not for waterproof purposes, let us say so.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PASTORE. I yield.

Mr. BUSH. Two or three years ago we had a similar case with respect to rubber-soled footwear. By slipping a leather liner into the sneaker, as we call it in this country, they were able to get a ruling from the collector that this was not rubber-soled footwear. The Honorable Antoni N. Sadlak, then Congressman at Large from Connecticut, introduced a bill to close that loophole, and I introduced a companion bill here.

Mr. PASTORE. The Senator from Rhode Island supported that legislation.

Mr. BUSH. The Senator did support it. That was a similar case to what the Senator is now talking about. If it is necessary to offer special legislation, I want him to know he can have my support.

Mr. PASTORE. I thank the Senator. At the time I made it my special point of business to get in touch with our distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee [Mr. BYRD of Virginia].

Mr. BUSH. I know the Senator did.

Mr. PASTORE. We had a hearing. That bill was immediately reported. Certain manufacturers were putting a leather tongue on a sneaker, and it came in as rubber goods.

Mr. BUSH. And rubber-soled footwear.

Mr. PASTORE. What are we doing?

Mr. BUSH. Fooling the people.

Mr. PASTORE. I thank the Senator for the answer.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PASTORE. I yield.

Mr. CARLSON. As a member of the Finance Committee, I well remember the Senator's appearance, and we were glad to have his assistance in the matter.

Mr. PASTORE. That is correct. I want to thank the Senator from Kansas for always exhibiting an understanding consideration of policies that do irreparable harm, because they lead to deceitful practices and should be eliminated.

It has been brought to my attention that importers are already taking advantage of the lower duty although the cloth, after being imported, must be finished to remove the starch in order to make it ink absorbent and no longer waterproof.

This, to me, is a loophole. I could use a harsher word, but I will not. I may say to the Members of the Senate that Mr. WILBUR D. MILLS, chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, has introduced legislation to which my bill is comparable. The House bill is H.R. 12437. His bill, like my own, would require classification of waterproof cloth according to the end use of the material, thereby closing the loophole precisely as the case should be.

I fully realize that it is the intention of the leadership on both sides of the aisle to confine this extraordinary session of the Congress to legislation which is considered to be top priority in our national well-being. But the passage of this bill is very important, inasmuch as it seeks to protect the jobs of American workers which might well be lost unless this loophole is closed.

But what is even more important, if the few mills which manufacture these very fine clothes, which, in many instances, are an integral part of our defense, the resulting damage to our overall security will be much more serious than we are able to perceive at the moment. Therefore, I strongly urge the members of the Finance Committee, to which in all probability this bill will be referred, to give serious attention to and speedy consideration of this legislation; and I shall be very willing, if they so desire, to appear at any time, at their convenience, to elaborate on the remarks that I am making today.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 3828) to limit the term "waterproof" when applied to cotton cloth or fabric, introduced by Mr. PASTORE, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. PASTORE. I yield.

Mr. BUSH. I do not want to intrude on the Senator's remarks, but if the Senator wants sponsors, I shall be glad to join as a cosponsor.

Mr. PASTORE. I shall be glad to have the senator join.

Mr. BUSH. But my point is a bill of this kind should come from the House of Representatives first.

Mr. PASTORE. A similar bill is there now. I thought if I introduced the measure it could be considered in committee. Then if the bill is passed in the House the spadework will have been done in the Senate. That is the only purpose I have in introducing it, so it will not be a new matter.

Mr. BUSH. I hope it will work out that way, although we have had bad luck with them once or twice.

Mr. PASTORE. I hope we will have better luck this time.

PHILADELPHIA LAWYERS, LEATHER-TONGUED SNEAKERS, AND WATERPROOFING

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator, my friend from Rhode Island, has spoken of a matter of considerable importance. In the course of his talk the Senator made reference to or used some phrases which I should like to use in another connection, if the Senator has no objection.

The Senator from Rhode Island referred to Philadelphia lawyers. I am a Philadelphia lawyer. The Senator then referred to leather-tongued sneakers in the shoe trade. And the Senator has referred to the deceit involved in waterproofing items and then going somewhere else and washing off the waterproofing.

I wish to apply each of those three remarks to what has been done in the rather swift and untimely execution ceremonies, by which the President's request for civil rights legislation was defeated by the action of almost the entire majority party over the objection of virtually the entire minority.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. SCOTT. I yield for a question.

Mr. PASTORE. I merely wish to say, anticipating what the Senator is going to say, realizing that the Senator comes from the other side of the aisle and that the remarks have nothing at all to do with the subject I brought up today, I respectfully disassociate myself from any similes or metaphors the Senator might attach to any statements I made.

Mr. SCOTT. I thank the Senator from Rhode Island. Since the Senator has not patented the similes or metaphors I now beg leave to make them my own, and so do.

This unseemly reversal of promises duly made in the City of the Angels by those gathered there for the purpose of making promises, so quickly repudiated, does not require a Philadelphia lawyer's talent to see through, or to see through the devices which have been adopted here for this purpose. I do not charge that those visitors in the City of the Angles were in fact, as they drafted the civil rights plank in their platform, leather-tongued sneakers. No, Mr. President, I do not make that charge. I do say, however, that they promised everything in the civil rights platform this side of Paradise, and they managed to convey the general impression that with this and other promises the vista this side of Paradise was to be preferred to the farther view.

In presenting this proposal on civil rights, they waterproofed it. They waterproofed it in order to convince the people of this country that they had a salable promise or a salable product. They waterproofed it, hoping the waterproofing would last until the latter part of this year. But, as the Senator from Rhode Island has said, sometimes people take goods and waterproof them, and then bring them to another place and wash the waterproofing off.

Mr. President, this is what has happened. The waterproofed civil rights plank, adopted in the City of the Angels by temporary residents of that community, who are therefore not necessarily entitled to that same appellation, was brought here in the hope that no one would bring up their embarrassing situation, if called upon to keep their promises.

Only yesterday a very distinguished Senator who sits on the back row made a statement outside of this body that the Republican Party had not been vigorous enough in securing passage of those two provisions which had been deleted from the proposed civil rights law of 1960, and which the President had asked to be restored. This distinguished Senator, who, by the way, failed to vote on either of these measures when there was an opportunity for vigor, as I have elsewhere noted, called for vigor. There was an opportunity for vigor today, because today the Senator from Illinois, the minority leader, introduced, at the President's suggestion, these two features of the Civil Rights Act.

What we have witnessed here was indeed vigor, but it was the vigor of a group of undertakers engaged in a mass burial. It was the vigor of those who wished earlier action to be forgotten as the warm, clean odors of the upturned soil enveloped their promises so recently conceived in the City of the Angels.

So, Mr. President, many a quondam advocate of civil rights reversed himself today. Many a noble assurance of support of civil rights was forgotten today. Many a speech made to many a group was relegated to the limbo of remarks which had better be forgotten, as the authors of this eloquence joined in a mass operation to destroy, by a parliamentary tactic, without debate, without consideration, and without any desire to permit anyone to discuss the civil rights of Americans, a civil rights program which might have been enacted by a Congress of men of good will intent on keeping their promises. I am sure that men of good will were involved here on both sides of the aisle, but the result must speak for itself.

No amount of pleading that other proposed legislation should take priority will deceive those who wonder why there is not at least some downpayment in August on the promises of the majority holding two-thirds of the membership of both Houses. No statement that other priorities are higher will deceive those who have followed the course of these proceedings. No statement that we must have time, indeed, to pass other measures which we might in fact have passed had we been so minded in the regular session of the Senate will deceive those who gave credence to, those who faithfully believed in, those who relied upon the promises made in the City of the Angels.

Mr. KEATING rose.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I yield to my friend, the junior Senator from New York.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I wonder if the Senator will yield for a question.

The Senator referred to waterproofing. Does not the Senator feel perhaps "waterlogging" would be a better description of what was done to the legislation which was offered?

Mr. SCOTT. Well, the plank was originally waterproofed, and then the waterproofing was washed off, and the plank is now waterlogged.

Mr. KEATING. It is waterlogged. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCOTT. There will, of course, be other planks which were heretofore waterproofed which will be dewaterproofed and will be waterlogged, as the session proceeds in its course of futility and of promises unkept.

Mr. KEATING. Exactly. I appreciate the clarification of the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania.

I should like to ask the Senator another question. When we observed the march, as the Senator puts it, to the City of the Angels, and the enactment of a platform—I am referring now to the platform on this specific subject—which expressly called for the enactment of the very provisions which we have today endeavored to give an opportunity to be voted upon here, does not the Senator feel that the action of those who enacted that platform and then, as the Senator will remember, warmly embraced it, may cause a high degree of cynicism in the minds of the American people about the strength of and the validity of platform promises?

We have heard that many of us in political life are sometimes prone to give certain credence to that cynicism. But the American people—and I hope that, insofar as possible, we as men in political life—support political platforms because they should mean something. But is not this performance likely to give rise to a considerable degree of skepticism and cynicism over the validity of platform promises?

Mr. SCOTT. I say to the distinguished Senator from New York that if members of the public do not become cynical about this performance, their capacity for cynicism and disillusion has itself been considerably watered down.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SCOTT. I yield to the distinguished senior Senator from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. I think the Senator from Pennsylvania is absolutely correct in expressing his indignation about what we have just seen in the Chamber. I think it proceeds upon two assumptions, which I do not think will escape the very serious attention of the American people.

One assumption is that civil rights legislation is, for some reason, to be graded down and is not as important as the particular legislation which has been named by the majority leader as proposed legislation we were called here to consider.

The second point is that the charge of politics is again intended to confuse and obfuscate in the eyes of the American people the fact that when something is not done, nothing is accomplished, that inaction is the worst kind of bad politics.

I make the following statement because the words "partisanship" and "politics" are loosely bandied around. I do not think anyone will fail to approve what the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] has just said, because that is the function of the minority. Certainly it is very clear now that a minority is involved, and that it is intended to roll over them at every opportunity, regardless of the rightness of the cause.

It seems to me that this is a very important function for the minority to perform for the American people, and if we should fail to perform it, we would be untrue to our responsibility. At long last we are performing it, and I do not think we ought to quail or shudder at the charge of politics at all. I compliment my colleague for not being in any way intimidated by that charge.

Mr. SCOTT. I agree entirely with my colleague. I point out that it is perfectly proper for the press to regard a session called in August, following two political conventions, and called at the behest of the majority, as a session which is likely to be charged with politics.

Senators are themselves certainly engaged in politics. But I suggest that we have a higher obligation, and I am sure that no man in or out of this Chamber would dare to make the assertion, nor would any responsible member of the press make the assertion, that the two Senators from New York and the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] are not in themselves entirely sincere in their pursuit over more than a decade of efforts to secure legislation in the interest of human rights, human need, and human decency.

A pattern, as the senior Senator from New York has pointed out, is definitely appearing, and the public ought to know it. That pattern is obviously to use the two-thirds majority vote, which the majority has in both Houses, to steamroller proposals which the majority leadership, in its wisdom, regards as unimportant or as lacking in priority, and to dispose of such proposals as early as possible, in order to return to the hustings. The majority leadership attempts to bring out such selective matters as may seem in the wisdom of the majority leadership of both Houses to contain the greatest appeal in a political campaign, and to shut off debate on all matters which the majority leadership feels is not worthy of their austere consideration and contemplation, and to create a narrow, limited, agenda for this session on the ground that that is what we were called back to do.

This Congress was not called back merely to complete action upon any one or a limited number of measures. This Congress was called back to complete the unfinished business of the 86th Congress. As the President pointed out in his message, there were 27 particular measures which he requested, of which only 6 have been acted upon. The President was right in asking for civil rights legislation. The majority was wrong in arbitrarily, without debate and without consideration, denying to the people of the United States even a fair consideration of civil rights proposals. I say that those who have taken this action must live with it.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SCOTT. I yield to the junior Senator from New York.

Mr. KEATING. Does not the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania agree with me that evidence is accumulating—and is accented here today in the performance that we have seen—to prove that this was all a grand design, and that many of us who opposed the present session when the question arose last July are seeing our direst predictions come to pass to a considerable extent by the action apparently to be taken here, in having the two-thirds majority ride roughshod over the minority?

Mr. SCOTT. I believe it is quite clear that the session is intended to be used as a forum for political foofaraw which some Members of the majority would have the people believe, rather than for the transaction of the public business.

We are called here to enact legislation which was not finished in this Congress, and which the President, our Chief Executive, has many times requested. We have heard much talk about sudden, last-minute requests from the Executive for this and that kind of legislation.

We know better than that. There have been many requests for a farm bill, for education, for area assistance. We know that the President of the United States has asked for a proper farm bill since he has been President and he has been denied such a bill. Certainly in the last 5 years he has not had the farm legislation which he needs to administer in the interest of the farmer, the consumer, and the public. He has asked over a period of years for area assistance where the need exists, and he has been denied it. Instead he has been twice offered a pork barrel by which the benefits have been so proliferated over so wide an area as to be of no substantial benefit to the areas of real chronic labor surplus.

The President has asked for a suitable aid-to-education bill to provide Federal grants in aid for the construction of schoolhouses, college dormitories, and other facilities, but he has been denied such legislation. He has been asking for it for years.

When I hear Senators speak condescendingly, as they do, and see them looking down their noses as they do, and imply that somehow the President of the United States has in some way failed in his duty, and say of him that "in the twilight of his term" he suddenly suggests these measures, I say, Mr. President, that the President of the United States has known where his duty lies. The people of the United States have known that their President is aware of where his duty lies. The people have recognized that the President in asking for legislation has asked for it in the public interest and not in the interest of pressure groups or of small, self-seeking segments of our citizenship.

The President has been consistent. The failure lies not in the President of the United States, but, as was said by a poet you will recall—

> The fault, dear Brutus, is not in our stars, but in ourselves.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania yield further?

Mr. SCOTT. I yield.

Mr. KEATING. Does not the distinguished Senator find it rather interesting—and, if it did not involve many serious questions, rather amusing—that the reaction to the President's message when it was read in the Chamber was that the majority leader and his leader and their cohorts have told us that it sounded just like the platform they have embraced, and that they liked it because it contained so much of their platform?

Apparently they have been so absorbed in reading the Democratic platform that they have failed to read the platform drafted, not in the City of the Angels, but in a city nearer us, the city of Chicago.

In that platform one if not all of the recommendations made repeatedly by the President of the United States to this and, in many instances, preceding Congresses under the same control were adopted. It seemed to me—and I feel sure it did also to the Senator from Pennsylvania—quite amusing to note the reception which the President's message received in this Chamber from our colleagues on the other side of the aisle.

Mr. SCOTT. The distinguished Senator from New York is quite right. In fact, the majority leader referred to the message of the President of the United States as the Democratic platform. I do not accept that. I accept it as evidence of the President's own views and of his own platform. He said in Chicago he continued to have one, and he proved, when he sent his message to the Senate, that it was a good one.

However, if the majority leader or the majority leader's leader believes that the President's message was the Democratic platform, why should they not be in haste to enact it? Why are they setting out by this motion to table—and doubtless by other parliamentary maneuvers and motions which will follow—to defeat the recommendations of the President of the United States, which the majority leader himself says represent the Democratic platform? What kind of animal is this which sees in another the image of itself and then attempts to attack that image and succeeds merely in biting its own tail?

Concluding with that somewhat agitated simile, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for a quorum call be rescinded.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard. The clerk will continue the call of the roll.

The legislative clerk resumed and concluded the call of the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEATING in the chair). A quorum is present.

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, during the past half hour or longer, just preceding the quorum call, we have listened to the distinguished junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] talk about civil rights. Among other things, he discussed the fact that the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] introduced, at the President's request, a civil rights proposal. The junior Senator from Pennsylvania stated, among other things, that this proposal has been coated over by the majority in the Senate. He used the expression that it was waterproofed by us. The distinguished junior Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING], who presently occupies the chair, substituted the word "waterlogging" for the phrase used by the junior Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. President, on this subject I propose briefly to state the facts. The facts are that from February 15 to May of this year the Senate debated the various civil rights proposals. Congress finally passed a bill, and the President signed it. There was at last enacted into law an effective civil rights act. During the course of the debate on that measure, by a margin of approximately three to one, the Senators on the minority side of the aisle voted to lay on the table a proposal substantially the same as the one the President now makes.

Let me say that during the long discourse by the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] he not only was waterproofing and waterlogging, but, Mr. President, in a manner he was seeking to place a political coating or veneer upon civil rights legislation in general, and in particular upon an effective legislative enactment of the Senate which occupied our time from February 15 to May.

In this connection, may I say that when the present occupant of the White House was elected in 1952, he carried with him into the House of Representatives and into the Senate a large majority of the Grand Old Party, of which I am not a member. Although during the years 1953 and 1954 there was a Republican majority in both branches of the Congress, at the same time that there was a Republican President, not one civil rights measure was enacted into law. In fact, no serious attempt to do so was made. The record clearly shows that, Mr. President.

While the junior Senator from Pennsylvania was on the floor, Mr. President, I observed in the Washington Daily News of today, issued less than 2 hours ago, an editorial in which it is stated:

> But if Congress took seriously this work assignment, it probably would still be in session on that day next January when it is to be succeeded by the Congress to be elected in November.

Mr. President, I shall not read all of this very fine editorial. Instead, I shall read only one more brief paragraph:

> Further civil rights legislation is urged by both platforms. But this, we think, is not the time. Any serious effort to deal with it would block all other work of Congress.

Mr. President, a little more than 5 months from now we shall have a new President and a newly elected Congress. We shall convene in January, to proceed with our work for the welfare of our country and for the peace of the world.

The recent proposals and contemplated proposals to inject civil rights legislation at this time, if seriously undertaken, might wreck the hopes for relief of the aged and the underprivileged and the unemployed in the distressed areas of our country.

Mr. President, we have an obligation. No matter what the distinguished junior Senator from Pennsylvania may say in his references to the platforms—I refer to his references to "waterproofing" and "waterlogging"—we certainly have a duty at this session to pass the necessary appropriation bills and to complete the unfinished business of great importance which was pending at the time when Congress adjourned in July, so that the Members of Congress could proceed to the conventions of their parties.

The obligation to give effect to the 1960 platform pledges adopted at the Democratic National Convention in Los Angeles belongs to the new administration and to the 87th U.S. Congress. In my humble judgment we should not try to give effect to the 1960 political platform pledges by forcing new civil rights measures at this "cleanup," final session of the 86th Congress.

Mr. President, it happens that I was born and reared on a farm in Huron County, Ohio, and lived there for a number of years. I remember an expression which was used there at that time, and probably is used throughout the country—"Clean up, and git."

Truly, Mr. President, if we were to be diverted because of some political advantage which the junior Senator from Pennsylvania thinks his party might obtain by having a prolonged debate on civil rights, we would be neglecting the truly important business before us, that the welfare of the aged and the welfare of the depressed areas of the country call upon us to attend to.

Mr. President, I had not intended to discuss this subject. In fact, I sought recognition at this time because I desired to address the Senate briefly upon another subject. But it seems to me that it was for political purposes only that this discussion was had by the junior Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. President, feeling that now I have dissipated by the liquid amber of my remarks the specious arguments made by the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] in regard to the action we should take on civil rights legislation during this short session, I wish to proceed to another subject, which I consider to be of great importance.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield very briefly?

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at this time I may yield to the Senator from Wisconsin, without losing the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEATING in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Then, Mr. President, I am glad to yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I wish to thank the Senator from Ohio for his courtesy. I have been waiting since noon to make a brief insertion in the RECORD. But, first, I wish to congratulate the Senator from Ohio upon his remarks. I wholeheartedly concur in them.

Let us look at the record. The fact is that last March and April we had a real chance to pass a strong civil rights bill. But it is also a fact that on every vote, an overwhelming majority of Republican Senators voted against a strong civil rights bill and against FEPC and against the very measure for which they voted this afternoon.

What is the difference now? Last winter, when we voted on this issue, the fact is that Democrats north of the Mason-Dixon line voted overwhelmingly for this legislation—the record is very clear on that—and the Republicans voted against it. This time the situation is reversed. Why is that? It is because last winter we had a chance to pass a civil rights bill. We had plenty of time. It was possible for us to outlast a filibuster. At that time the Republicans were not willing to help us. This time they know perfectly well that there is not a chance in the world of passing a strong civil rights bill in the 2 or 3 or 4 weeks we have before Congress must adjourn. I congratulate the distinguished Senator from Ohio.

MEDICAL INSURANCE FOR AGED NEEDED BY THOSE UNDER 65

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, last month both political parties committed themselves in their national conventions to pass legislation to provide health insurance for the aged. This is one of three or four major controversial legislative actions expected by the Nation from this August session of Congress. The need is urgent. Wisconsin citizens continue to write to me, telling me, more persuasively than any speech could, the simple human reasons of personal experience that explain why we should act promptly and generously.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that a letter from a younger couple warmly applauding this legislation be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

> DEAR SIR: Many of our would-be humanitarians preach State and local responsibility but then hold fast to a status quo position when a social program is suggested.
> We are supposed to be the most charitable Nation in the world, and this is probably so, but our charity can also be an irony and paradoxical.
> Hundreds of warehouses are bulging with surplus foodstuffs for other peoples, and we have and still are giving billions to questionable friends throughout the world, but I fail to see in a land of so much affluence where we have maintained a paralleling concern for the welfare of our elderly people.
> My dad died in December 1958, at the age of 86, having been blind for the last 15 years of his life. My mother, age 82, lives in a $45 per month apartment.
> Both my father and mother have received fine medical attention. And the small social security payment of $45 monthly that my mother receives has been invaluable in helping me with the expense.
> So far as I am concerned, social security must be our greatest social achievement. It should be nurtured and strengthened.
> I am 55, and my wife is 53, and we would like to start building a reserve for our own retirement, but this is clouded by the prospects of a considerably greater future cash outlay for both of our dependent mothers. Then, too, we never know if our own bodies will continue physically strong.
> In the last 7 years, my contributions have totaled about $5,000 gross, necessitating what I consider a good deal of retrenchment on the part of my wife and me.
> Our friends wonder why we continue to drive a 1950 car.

RESOLUTION BY LUTHERAN LAYMEN'S LEAGUE

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, the Lutheran Laymen's League, at its annual convention held in Minneapolis July 10 to 13, adopted a resolution expressing its deep concern about the prevalence of violence, immorality, and bad taste in pictures, programs, and publications being disseminated by our mass communications media.

The Lutheran Laymen's League is an outstanding organization of Christian laymen, with a membership of over 120,000.

This organization does not ask for any form of censorship that will interfere with any person's constitutionally guaranteed right of free speech, but it is its sincere hope and concern that the National Government and our States will call conferences of citizens, with the hope that some solution can be arrived at for this most serious and pressing problem.

I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be made a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTION 60-04

Resolution on immorality, violence, and bad taste in pictures, programs, and publications

Whereas decent citizens of the United States and Canada are becoming increasingly disturbed by the prevalence of immorality, violence, and bad taste in publications, motion pictures, television and radio programs, and in the mass communications media generally; and

Whereas the fundamental values of respect for God, for human life, for marriage, home and family, for property, for virtue, for good name and reputation are being degraded and eroded by these unwholesome influences and materials; and

Whereas these evils can be combated and rooted out only by the united and persistent efforts of all decent citizens; and

Whereas we Lutheran laymen, as followers of the Lord Jesus Christ, must be in the forefront of this battle for decency and morality: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Lutheran Laymen's League, assembled in convention in Minneapolis, Minn., from July 9 to July 13, 1960, hereby—

(a) Commends and supports the producers of all acceptable publications, motion pictures and television and radio programs for recognizing and discharging their moral responsibilities in this respect;

(b) Commends the Postmaster General of the United States for his diligent efforts to "clean up the mails";

(c) Encourage current efforts in the two Houses of the U.S. Congress to convene a conference of Federal, State, and local officials, together with representatives of other interested groups, to study this matter and make recommendations for ways and means to deal with the problem effectively;

(d) Take the necessary steps to have a delegate from the Lutheran Laymen's League and also a delegate from the Lutheran Church-Missouri Synod participate in such a conference;

(e) Make a determined effort, as individuals and as a group, to see to it that none of these offensive influences come into our own homes by way of publications and television and radio programs, and that we and the members of our families pledge ourselves to choose our entertainment outside the home carefully and in accordance with God's word;

(f) Pray fervently and frequently that Almighty God will strengthen each one of us, our families, our communities and our nations, so that we may overcome the dissemination of these unwholesome influences and lift our society to new and higher levels of morality, virtue and decency; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be released to the public press for publication and that copies be sent to the appropriate officials of the motion picture industry, the radio and television industries, the publishing industry, to Members of the Congress and to other public officials and civic and religious leaders who are or should be interested in this matter.

ADDITIONAL FUNDS PROVIDED BY CONGRESS FOR DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, just about an hour before today's session began, Secretary Gates sent me a reply to my letter of July 28, in which I requested him to advise me whether the Department of Defense intends to use the additional funds provided by the Congress for fiscal year 1961.

I have been told that replies to other requests for this information are being held up by the Pentagon until Secretary Gates' letter to me is released. While we have not had time to analyze the letter in any detail, I am anxious that the American people get all the facts as quickly as possible and, therefore, I have advised Secretary Gates that I would have no objection to the immediate release of his letter.

A quick reading of Secretary Gates' letter indicates that it does not provide all the information requested. For example, in my letter of July 28, I requested Secretary Gates to inform me whether he has rescinded or repudiated the memorandum issued by his office on June 9, 1960, which stated:

If the Congress makes available more funds for fiscal year 1961 than are requested, and where the law does not require expenditure, agencies should reserve the increases and carry them forward to the maximum practical extent to fiscal year 1962.

Unfortunately, there is no answer to this direct question.

My letter of July 28 also requested copies of the specific "shopping lists" submitted for approval by the military departments, as well as changes made by the Office of the Secretary of Defense and the Bureau of the Budget and the reasons for such changes. However, this information has also been omitted.

One thing is crystal clear from the information that has been provided. This is the fact that a substantial portion of the funds provided by the Congress are impounded and are planned to remain impounded for the rest of this fiscal year.

On July 7 the Department of Defense issued its financial plan for fiscal year 1961. This plan showed that $1,097,633,000 was planned to be held "available for future requirements." This is Pentagon gobbledegook for the simple word "impounded."

The Department of Defense has now issued a revised financial plan for fiscal year 1961, which presumably ties in with the message addressed to the Congress by the President yesterday. This revised financial plan shows that $621,302,000 is still impounded.

As yet, I have received no reply to my letter of August 2 asking the Secretary of Defense whether additional funds would be used in the event that the Congress, in discharging its constitutional responsibility and providing for the national defense, should decide to make funds available. In view of the fact that the administration has decided to impound $621,302,000 of the funds already provided by the Congress, it is obvious what its policy would be with regard to any additional funds.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD at this point my letters to the Secretary of Defense of July 28 and August 2, and his letter of August 9 in reply to the first of these letters, and when I receive a reply to the second letter I should like to have unanimous consent to insert it in the RECORD, also.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES,
July 28, 1960.

Hon. THOMAS S. GATES, Jr.,
The Secretary of Defense,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: It has come to my attention that a memorandum was issued on June 9, 1960, by the Office of the Secretary to the Secretaries of the Army, Navy, and Air Force and to the Assistant Secretary of Defense (Comptroller) which stated that:

"If the Congress makes available more funds for fiscal year 1961 than are requested, and where the law does not require expenditure, agencies should reserve the increases and carry them forward to the maximum practical extent to fiscal year 1962."

As you know, after careful consideration of the testimony presented by all the witnesses during 5 months of detailed hearings, the Congress, in dealing with the Department of Defense Appropriation Act, 1961 (Public Law 86-601), appropriated $661,608,000 more than had been requested in the President's budget. This net increase of $661,608,000 was the end result of various program increases of roughly $1¾ billion and individual reductions totaling approximately $1.1 billion.

I should like to know whether the memorandum of June 9, 1960, from which I quoted, has since been repudiated or rescinded. In addition, please furnish this subcommittee with a clear-cut statement concerning current Department of Defense policy with regard to immediate and full utilization of the additional funds provided by the Congress. This statement should cover each of the individual items or programs for which the Congress provided funds in excess of the budget request.

I should also appreciate your advising me as to the specific steps that have been taken, as well as those planned to be taken, in order to eliminate wasteful contracting, supply mismanagement, and other procurement deficiencies in order to achieve the economies called for by the Congress in making a 3-percent overall reduction in procurement funds.

Since the law requires funds to be apportioned within 30 days after enactment of the Appropriation Act, it is requested that this subcommittee be furnished with a complete accounting of the apportionment actions taken to date with respect to funds available for fiscal year 1961.

This should be supplemented with the following information (in duplicate):

1. All instructions—other than purely procedural—issued by the Bureau of the Budget and by the Office of the Secretary of Defense with respect to apportionments. This should include directives or instructions which would affect apportionments, such as directives or instructions dealing with obligational programs, expenditure objectives, etc.

2. The specific "shopping lists" submitted for approval by the military departments, as well as changes made by the Office of the Secretary of Defense and the Bureau of the Budget and the reasons for such changes.

3. Each successive Department of Defense "financial plan for fiscal year 1961," as well as any instructions accompanying the plan.

4. A statistical summary showing by appropriation, the amounts available for apportionment and the amounts apportioned to date. Explanation should be given of all amounts placed in reserve or not fully released for obligation or commitment.

I should appreciate this information being provided as quickly as possible, but in no event later than August 5.

Sincerely,

LYNDON B. JOHNSON,
Chairman, Preparedness Subcommittee.

U.S. SENATE,
OFFICE OF THE DEMOCRATIC LEADER,
Washington, D.C., August 2, 1960.

Hon. THOMAS S. GATES, Jr.,
The Secretary of Defense,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: During the forthcoming session of the Congress, consideration will be given to the need for additional funds for the programs essential to a strengthened national defense.

This consideration will cover such programs as Army modernization, Navy modernization, airborne alert, acceleration of ballistic missile programs, acceleration of military satellites, airlift, antisubmarine warfare, augmentation of manned bomber capabilities, augmented troop strengths, expanded research and development, and other high priority programs.

I should appreciate your advising me now whether such additional funds would be used, in the event that the Congress, in discharging its constitutional responsibility of providing for the national defense, should decide to make additional funds available.

If so, I should also appreciate your specific recommendations as to the amounts that can be used effectively during fiscal year 1961, what could be accomplished with such funds, and which programs the Department of Defense believes should be augmented or accelerated in order to assure that America's future military strength will be unquestionably second to none.

Sincerely,

LYNDON B. JOHNSON.

THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,
Washington, D.C., August 9, 1960.

Hon. LYNDON JOHNSON,
Chairman, Preparedness Subcommittee,
U.S. Senate.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Your letter of July 28, 1960, inquires about our plans for the utilization of funds appropriated by the Congress in excess of the President's January budget request. You realize, of course, that a large part of that addition consists of items recommended by the administration to the Senate Appropriations Committee subsequent to the January budget request. Included in that category are the additional funds requested for Army modernization, airlift, aircraft, Minuteman, Polaris, antisubmarine warfare research and development, Midas, Discoverer, Atlas, BMEWS and certain air defense programs, totaling over $750 million.

In his special message to the Congress yesterday, the President made reference to the balance of the additional funds appropriated by the Congress. In more detail, the following decisions have been reached as of this date:

1. The Army National Guard and Army Reserve will be supported at strengths of 400,000 and 300,000 men, respectively, utilizing in full the additional funds appropriated for this purpose. About half of the additional funds provided for Army National Guard technicians will be used to equalize their pay rates with those prevailing in their communities.

2. The additional funds appropriated for the promotion of rifle practice will be used.

3. About $28 million more of the additional funds appropriated for Army modernization will be utilized now to increase the rate of production of the new Army tank, leaving the balance for future consideration.

4. Additional funds provided for airlift aircraft will be utilized, in whole or in part, depending upon the specific programs to be determined shortly.

5. The airborne alert capability will be augmented, utilizing the additional funds appropriated.

6. Additional funds will be made available for the development of the B–70. The technical details of this program are still under study and the exact amount which can be properly applied to it during fiscal year 1961 cannot yet be determined. However, it is presently estimated that about $100 million of the congressional add-ons will be used, bringing the total for this program to about $195 million for the current fiscal year.

7. The major portion of the additional funds appropriated for the Samos program will be utilized to provide an alternative approach to certain critical phases of this development. While this program, too, is under technical study, it now appears that another $50 million will be utilized to bring the total for the combined Air Force Space Satellite program to $427 million for the current fiscal year.

8. The Polaris program will be increased from three fully funded and nine partially funded submarines to five fully funded and five partially funded, utilizing most of the additional funds appropriated.

9. Also, because of the progress of the Polaris system, development of a considerably longer range Polaris missile will be initiated. This item was not included in either the January or the revised Defense Department budget request, or in the congressional add-ons. However, we believe that the additional funds required can be found by reprograming within available resources.

We do not plan to use the funds appropriated by the Congress for additional interceptor aircraft because the bill as finally enacted substantially provided the funds requested for air defense, particularly for the Bomarc-B missile and the improvement of existing interceptors.

In view of the fact that the nuclear-powered attack submarines in the 1960 program have just been awarded, and because of the impact of the recent increase in the Polaris program, there are no immediate plans to use the additional funds appropriated for the SSN's in excess of the Defense Department's revised budget request.

Attachment A provides further details on the utilization of congressional add-ons.

As the President indicated, certain other measures designed to improve the readiness and posture of our forces have already been taken or are under consideration. A third attack carrier is being assigned to the 6th Fleet and three attack carriers will be retained by the 7th Fleet. These additional deployments will involve the recommissioning of two fleet oilers to support the increased level of operations in both the Atlantic and Pacific.

A number of B–47 medium bombers and their accompanying tankers, scheduled to be phased out of the force during fiscal year 1961, will be retained. Furthermore, the rate of operation of the entire B–47 force will be increased and their deployment further dispersed.

Army readiness will be further enhanced by an increase in the number and scope of strategic and airborne exercises.

Other than the additional readiness measures and the utilization of congressional add-ons, the fiscal year 1961 program as it now stands is essentially the same as that reflected in the justification material furnished to the Congress in connection with the fiscal year 1961 budget presentation. These and any future program changes will be reported to the Congress as required by the established reprograming procedures.

None of these defense measures requires additional funding at this time. Some of them will be financed from appropriations already made in this session. With respect to other measures, we will meet their costs within available resources insofar as possible. If we should find that the additional readiness measures cannot be accommodated within available appropriations we will promptly take the appropriate action to submit a supplemental request for the necessary funds.

I believe that the foregoing fairly answers your principal questions with regard to the utilization of the additional funds appropriated by the Congress. All of our programs, force levels and deployments are kept under constant review. Where technological breakthroughs occur, emphasis will be added; where programs are overtaken by events, terminations will be effected. This is in accord with the long-established policy of the executive branch; no change has been made in this policy.

With respect to the 3-percent across-the-board cut in procurement funds imposed by the Congress, we will, of course, make every effort to absorb the reduction in funds with a minimum reduction in program. As you know, the Department of Defense works continuously and systematically to improve contracting procedures. We feel that contract negotiations are being conducted on the basis of more complete and more accurate cost information for both the prime and subcontractor levels. Only last week I, together with the Chiefs of Staff and the service Secretaries, met with some 50 of the leading aircraft and missile manufacturers and construction contractors to engage their full cooperation and invite their counsel with respect to improving performance on our ICBM programs. We stressed the need for coordinating the efforts of the various participants in the program, improvements in quality control and labor productivity, and other measures which would assist in meeting activation schedules and in effecting cost reductions. Improvements in contracting procedures were also discussed. A more detailed statement on improvements in procurement and supply management is furnished in attachment B.

Whether we can absorb the full 3-percent reduction in procurement funds made by the Congress, amounting to over $400 million, while concurrently making a substantial reduction in civilian personnel employed at the Washington headquarters, is still a question.

Your final question relates to the status of apportionment actions for fiscal year 1961. The attached schedule (attachment C) shows that 98 percent of the funds covered by Public Law 86–601 and planned for apportionment (excluding most of the congressional add-ons which were set aside for further study) were in fact apportioned within 5 days after the President signed the bill.

With respect to the funds not yet apportioned and the items "apportioned but undergoing review," I am sure you appreciate that not all service programs are ready to go forward at the time the bill is enacted into law. For many reasons—technical difficulties, changes in concepts, lack of definitive plans—additional time is frequently required in order to assure the development of valid programs. As a matter of good business practice, we must assure that the requirement is still valid in the light of present circumstances, and that all significant aspects of the program have been properly worked out before the funds are released.

Attachment D consists of the instructions issued in relation to fiscal year 1961 apportionment actions.

The last attachment consists of the three fiscal year 1961 financial plans which have been published to date.

We trust that this material will be adequate to your needs. We will be glad to provide such further explanations of the attached information as you may desire.

Sincerely,

THOMAS S. GATES, Jr.

[1] Represents the 3-percent general reduction against the appropriation, "Procurement of equipment and missiles, Army" since the total appropriation is for "modernization."

[2] In addition, unprogramed funds of $110,580,000 representing the reduction of $114,000,000 in the DOD semiofficial revised budget for antisubmarine warfare less the 3 percent general procurement cut of $3,420,000.

[3] The conference committee indicated that if developments in air defense demonstrate that the additional funds for fighter aircraft are not required, they shall be available only for the B–70 aircraft program.

[4] Includes $50,000,000 added by Senate which by conference action is also available for the acceleration of the Midas and Discoverer satellite programs and for the Minuteman mobility program.

[5] Included in these amounts are the additional funds requested by Department of Defense revisions for Army modernization, airlift aircraft, Minuteman, Polaris, antisubmarine warfare research and development, Midas, Discoverer, Atlas, BMEWS and certain air defense programs, totaling over $750,000,000.

[6] Additional amounts may be utilized to finance the development of an increased range Polaris missile. This specific item was not included in either the January or the revised DOD budget, or in the congressional add-ons.

PROCUREMENT

The 3 percent across-the-board reduction in procurement funds was recommended in the House Appropriations Committee Report to assure improvements in procurement practices. The conclusion that such improvements were necessary was based on examples of inefficient practices cited in the report (pp. 51–53). Most of these examples came from reports to the Congress by the Comptroller General.

Prior to the development of the fiscal year 1961 procurement estimates, the Office of the Secretary of Defense and each of the military departments took a number of specific actions to correct the kind of deficiencies cited by the House Appropriations Committee. For example, the Armed Services Procurement Regulation has been revised to strengthen its coverage of pricing policies and techniques, subcontract pricing, and the principles controlling allowable costs. Each of the military departments has also made substantial improvements in contracting methods, reviews, and audits. Every effort is currently being made to maximize procurement by formal advertising and competition is being obtained in a substantial portion of our negotiated procurement.

These corrective actions have, from a policy standpoint, been acknowledged by the General Accounting Office as being appropriate to the correction of the deficiencies cited.

In summary, the Department of Defense has acted to correct the deficiencies cited and has made substantial progress to date. The fiscal year 1961 budget estimate assumed further improvements would be made. These improvements are a part of an orderly and continued effort to eliminate deficiencies in procurement policies and procedures, and to isolate and correct errors should they occur. Consequently, it will be extremely difficult to achieve further economies sufficient to absorb the 3 percent across-the-board reduction. To the extent the Department is unable to effect these additional economies, the reduction will have the effect of reducing the number of missiles, ships, aircraft and other material which can be purchased with these appropriations.

SUPPLY MANAGEMENT

Military supply management in recent years has progressed significantly to achieve the highest level of effectiveness and economy in the history of the Department of Defense. Supply management accomplishments are well documented in hearings before the Congress and have been recognized by committees in their reports to the Congress. The following results testify to the forward strides that have been taken in this important management area:

1. In the 2 fiscal years prior to 1960, supply system inventories were reduced by $7.3 billion, and when final reports are compiled for fiscal year 1960 it is expected that the 3-year total will approximate $10 billion. At the same time management has improved the overall readiness position of supporting inventories by planned balancing of stocks and by transfer of ownership of stocks between the military services.

2. In the past 3 years comprehensive policies and systems have been developed to assure that equipment and supplies available anywhere in the Department are transferred and used before new procurement dollars are expended for similar items. In fiscal year 1958, this cross utilization of long-supply materiel totaled $587 million; for fiscal year 1960 these savings will amount to $2 billion.

3. In submitting the fiscal year 1961 defense budget to the Congress, the results of improved supply management were further anticipated by making a $100 million reduction in the estimate for depot supply system costs.

4. Military warehouses covering 55 million square feet of floor space have been closed, and by June 1962 an additional 19 million square feet of space will be inactivated.

5. In the past fiscal year four new single managers have been established in the commodity areas of general, industrial, construction, and automotive supplies. In its report on military supply management dated June 30, 1960, the Committee on Government Operations of the House stated:

"The single manager program has accomplished some of the purposes sought by the Congress without creating new problems of the order of magnitude of a fourth service and with a relatively easy transition, as well as insuring no interruption of the logistics support furnished to military commands."

The estimated savings from single manager operation have been constantly increasing. In the above-cited committee report an increase in savings of 75 percent in 1 year was recognized and further increases can be expected as these integrated management organizations become fully operational.

6. Similarly recognized in the previously cite committee report, and by numerous Members of the Congress in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, was the establishment on May 12, 1960, of a defense communications system and a Defense Communications Agency. This new system represents a consolidation of Army, Navy, and Air Force communications systems and will provide more effective and more economical use of circuits and facilities.

The momentum of progress achieved in recent years in supply management is continuing. The defense materiel management program is designed to carry forward to new higher levels the solid accomplishments of recent years.

ATTACHMENT D

OFFICE OF THE ASSISTANT
SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,
Washington, D.C., April 5, 1960.

Memorandum for the Under Secretary of the Navy; the Assistant Secretary of the Army (FM); the Assistant Secretary of the Air Force (FM); the Director, Administrative Services Division, OSD.

Experience has shown the best way to make possible prompt handling of official annual apportionment requests upon passage of the appropriation act is to review preliminary backup data before the act is passed. This Office plans to use such a preliminary review procedure again this year in connection with the fiscal year 1961 apportionment requests.

Last year the military departments were requested to base their preliminary apportionment backup data on the House committee report, and to submit the backup data 2 weeks after issue of the House report. Since the House report does not necessarily reflect the final content of the appropriation act, such a schedule resulted in an added interim adjustment of financial plans under a short schedule, to be followed by still another adjustment upon final passage of the act.

In order to reduce the work involved in adjustments to financial programs and plans, and allow the departments time to make an adequate review of the apportionment backup data before submitting it, it is requested this year that the military departments: (a) base their preliminary apportionment backup data on amounts in the President's budget (including amendments, if any) reflecting latest approved programs and financial plans; (b) submit such backup data to this Office by May 23, 1960.

This arrangement should provide time for considered review within the departments before the preliminary backup material is submitted to this Office. Subsequently, in support of the official apportionment requests, the backup data should require only such adjustments as the act in its final signed form makes necessary. Official apportionment requests on DD form 1105 will not be submitted with the preliminary backup data.

This memorandum does not modify the requirements with respect to stock funds as set forth in my memorandum of May 14, 1959, as revised; namely, the submission of official apportionment requests and supporting data by May 6, 1960.

Revision No. 2 to my memorandum of May 14, 1959, "Guidance for the Preparation of Support Material for Apportionment Requests and Budget Estimate" is now being printed and should reach the military departments before April 11, 1960.

H. R. LOGAN,
Deputy Comptroller for Budget.

OFFICE OF THE ASSISTANT
SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,
Washington, D.C., June 15, 1960.

Memorandum for the Under Secretary of the Navy; the Assistant Secretary of the Army (FM); the Assistant Secretary of the Air Force (FM); the Director, Administrative Services Division, OSD.

In anticipation of early congressional action on the appropriation bills relating to the Department of Defense, it is desired that apportionment schedules be processed as expeditiously as possible. The Bureau of the Budget has advised that Department of Defense obligation and expenditure plans for fiscal year 1961 will be required before the apportionment schedules can be approved (copy attached). As a basis for updating the financial plans reflected in the President's budget it is requested that addressees provide revised financial plan data, based on conference action, within 48 hours after release of the conference reports. This will apply to the Department of Defense Appropriation Act, the Military Construction Appropriation Act, and the Mutual Security Appropriation Act. The data presented for the last of the three appropriation acts will include summary lines for the two preceding acts so that combined military functions-military assistance totals will be provided therewith.

Specific instructions for submission of the data are attached.

H. R. LOGAN,
Deputy Comptroller for Budget.

EXECUTIVE OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT,
BUREAU OF THE BUDGET,
Washington, D.C., June 8, 1960.

Memorandum for Mr. Franklin B. Lincoln, Assistant Secretary of Defense (Comptroller).

It is requested that the Bureau of the Budget be furnished, as soon as possible following congressional action on the 1961 budget, revised obligation and expenditure plans and an analysis of reimbursements covering military functions of the Department of Defense for fiscal year 1961. An obligation plan similar in format to EFAD 349 (for fiscal year 1960) will be satisfactory. The expenditure plan should reflect for each appropriation and fund the planned utilization of the total 1961 expenditure availability in 1961, 1962, 1963, 1964, and thereafter. In addition this expenditure plan should be summarized by functional title and military department. This information will be required before the apportionments for the fiscal year 1961 can be approved.

You are also requested to submit, in conjunction with your financial plan for 1961 required by Circular No. A-24, a monthly phasing of gross expenditures, reimbursement collections, and net budget expenditures by appropriation and fund account. The format followed in prior years will be acceptable in meeting this requirement.

WILLIAM F. SCHAUB,
Chief, Military Division.

INSTRUCTIONS FOR SUBMISSION OF FINANCIAL PLAN DATA, FISCAL YEAR 1961

A. FINANCIAL PLAN FOR OBLIGATIONS

1. Format: Use the format of EFAD table 378 dated 18 January 1960 with the addition of a new column "Available for future requirements" between columns 18 and 19.

2. Military assistance: Show data for the transfer account from Military Assistance with separate lines for ".002 MAP orders" and for "All Other" with a total for the transfer account. Do not show any new 1961 availability for .002 MAP orders.

B. FINANCIAL PLAN FOR EXPENDITURES

1. Relationship to financial plan for obligations: The expenditure plan shall be based on and consistent with the fiscal year 1961 financial plan for obligations (including obligations in future years for completion of approved programs).

2. Format: Use the attached format. This is similar to the format used for the printed fiscal year 1959 expenditure plan.

3. Military assistance: Show data for the transfer account from military assistance with separate lines for ".002 MAP orders" and for "all other." The ".002 MAP orders" line will be further broken down to show the recipient military function appropriation; the expenditures shown for fiscal year 1961 should be equal to the contra-amount included as reimbursements in computation of the net expenditure figures for the military function accounts. Do not include any fiscal year 1961 availability for .002 MAP orders.

OFFICE OF THE ASSISTANT
SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,
Washington, D.C., June 21, 1960.

Memorandum for the Under Secretary of the Navy; the Assistant Secretary of the Army (FM); the Assistant Secretary of the Air Force (FM); the Director, Administrative Services Division, OSD.

Reference is made to the memorandum from this Office dated April 5, 1960, requesting addressees to submit preliminary fiscal year 1961 apportionment backup data by May 23, 1960; and to the memorandum dated June 15, 1960, requesting submission of revised fiscal year 1961 financial plan data, based on conference action, within 48 hours after release of the conference reports.

It is hereby requested that addressees submit official apportionment schedules within 3 working days after release of the conference reports. These schedules should be based on financial plans submitted in accordance with the June 15, 1960, memorandum noted above; and should be supported by data modifying, as necessary, the preliminary backup data previously furnished under provisions of the April 5, 1960, memorandum.

H. R. LOGAN,
Deputy Comptroller for Budget.

[1] Excludes the effect of Public Law 86-568, Federal Employees Salary Increase Act of 1960, pending submission by the military departments of detailed analyses by appropriation.

[2] Does not include any fiscal year 1961 MAP common item orders since value and distribution of such orders are not determinable at this time.

[3] Upon enactment of pending legislation, a supplemental currently estimated at $31,320,000 would be required.

[4] Provision has been made in planned service account (direct) obligations for conversion to obligations of unobligated portions of procurements involving letter contracts brought into fiscal year 1961 as follows: "Procurement of ordnance and ammunition, Navy," $20,000,000; "Aircraft procurement, Air Force," $150,000,000; "Missile procurement, Air Force," $100,000,000; "Other procurement, Air Force," $50,000,000.

[5] Reflects anticipated transfer of $6,300,000 to Atomic Energy Commission.

[6] Transfer of up to $20,000,000 from "Salaries and expenses, Advanced Research Projects Agency" is authorized.

[7] Excludes proposed $30,000,000 reappropriation transfer of unexpended balances from expired accounts to the revolving fund account "Acquisition, rehabilitation, and rental of Wherry Act housing."

[8] The total obligational availability is the sum of the amounts available to each individual appropriation account. Consequently, the totals of the appropriation groupings as well as the departmental and DOD totals are overstated by the "duplicate count" of reimbursements arising from intraservice and interservice reimbursement transactions which in grant total, amount to approximately $1,000,000,000.

[2] Does not include any fiscal year 1961 MAP common item orders since value and distribution of such orders are not determinable at this time.

[3] Upon enactment of pending legislation, a supplemental currently estimated at $31,320,000 would be required.

[4] Provision has been made in planned service account (direct) obligations for conversion to obligations of unobligated portions of procurements involving letter contracts brought into fiscal year 1961 as follows: "Procurement of ordnance and ammunition, Navy," $20,000,000; "Aircraft procurement, Air Force," $150,000,000 "Missile procurement, Air Force," $100,000,000; "Other procurement, Air Force," $50,000,000.

[5] Reflects anticipated transfer of $6,300,000 to Atomic Energy Commission.

[6] Transfer of up to $20,000,000 from "Salaries and expenses, Advanced Research Projects Agency" is authorized.

[7] Excludes proposed $30,000,000 reappropriation transfer of unexpended balances from expired accounts to the revolving fund account "Acquisition, rehabilitation, and rental of Wherry Act housing."

[8] The total obligational availability is the sum of the amounts available to each individual appropriation account. Consequently, the totals of the appropriation groupings as well as the departmental and DOD totals are overstated by the "duplicate count" of reimbursements arising from intraservice and interservice reimbursement transactions which in grant total, amount to approximately $1,000,000,000.

[1] Excludes applicable portion of $1,443,150,000 MAP .002 orders anticipated to be issued from fiscal year 1961 "Military assistance" appropriation. Distribution of these orders by recipient appropriation or revolving fund account is not determinable at this time.

[2] Provision has been made in planned service account (direct) obligations for conversion to obligations of unobligated portions of procurements involving letter contracts brought into fiscal year 1961 as follows: "Procurement of ordnance and ammunition, Navy," $20,000,000; "Aircraft procurement, Air Force," $150,000,000; "Missile procurement, Air Force," $100,000,000; "Other procurement, Air Force," $50,000,000.

[3] Excludes proposed $30,000,000 reappropriation transfer of unexpended balances from expired accounts to the revolving fund account "Acquisition, rehabilitation, and rental of Wherry Act housing."

[4] The total obligational availability is the sum of the amounts available to each individual appropriation account. Consequently, the totals of the appropriation groupings as well as the departmental and DOD totals are overstated by the "duplicate count" of reimbursements arising from intraservice and interservice reimbursement transactions which in grand total, amount to approximately $900,000,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I should like to follow that with a memorandum with regard to the President's message yesterday in connection with certain defense items. I ask unanimous consent to have it inserted at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the memorandum was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In his message to the Congress yesterday the President referred to actions he had taken to expand certain long-range defense programs.

Although the President failed to mention it, the only reason he was able to take these actions was because the Congress had appropriated additional funds for these programs over the protests of the administration.

1. Continuous airborne alert: The President's budget requested $85 million. Congress provided $170 million—an increase of $85 million—and also provided blank check authority for the President to spend any amount he considered necessary for airborne alert.

2. Modernization of Army combat equipment: The President's budget requested $1,337 million for total Army procurement. Congress appropriated $1,495 million—an increase of $158 million.

3. Military airlift: The President's budget included $120 million for airlift modernization. The Congress added an additional $200 million for this purpose. (The books will show a net increase in appropriations of $190 million, since the $200 million increase is reduced by $10 million attributable to the 3 percent across-the-board procurement cut.)

4. B–70: The President's budget included $75 million for developing two B–70 nonoperational prototypes. The Congress increased this to $265 million—an increase of $190 million—and also provided an additional $100 million which could be used for additional fighter aircraft or for the B–70. Congress specified that the additional funds were to be used to develop the B–70 as a complete weapons system.

5. Samos reconnaissance satellite: The President's budget included $333 million for three Air Force satellite programs—Samos, Midas, and Discoverer. The Air Force stated in April that $206 million of this combined total was programed for the Samos. The Congress provided a total of $290 million for Samos—$84 million more than the budget request.

6. Polaris: The President's budget included $952 million for three Polaris submarines plus partial financing for long leadtime components for three additional submarines. The Congress appropriated $1,346 million for five Polaris submarines plus partial financing for seven additional submarines. This is an increase of $394 million over the President's budget request.

(In April, the Secretary of Defense recommended adding $153 million to the Polaris program, thereby supporting a revised program of three fully funded Polaris submarines plus long leadtime components for nine additional submarines. This would have provided $1,105 million for Polaris. However, the Secretary of Defense also recommended deleting two nuclear attack submarines from the program, in order to obtain $114 million of the $153 million additional costs for Polaris. The Congress ignored the Department of Defense request to delete the two attack submarines—as a matter of fact, the Congress added $57 million for an additional attack submarine over and above the three that had been in the President's budget originally.)

THE HIGH PRICE OF CHEAP MONEY

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, if I may be permitted to paraphrase, "Cheap money is the root of all financial evil." There are many Americans and many American institutions who understand this, believe this, and do not hesitate to proclaim it. One of the most influential and convincing guardians of this principle is the Wall Street Journal, and in this morning's edition, on the editorial page, the Wall Street Journal quotes from a table compiled by the First National City Bank of New York to show that the United States, far from being unbelievably tightfisted, has the lowest interest rate for borrowed money in the world. Second, the editorial points out that it is in those countries which have attempted to run their economy with "cheap" or "easy" money where the interest rates are the highest in the world, soaring as high as 13½ and 15 percent in some nations.

Mr. President, as the editorial concludes, "the moral in this little tour of the world, if it needs to be stated, is that for the people 'cheap' money is the most expensive of all."

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the following editorial from the Wall Street Journal, dated August 9 and entitled, "The High Price of Cheap Money."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Wall Street Journal, Aug. 9, 1960]

THE HIGH PRICE OF CHEAP MONEY

The Democrats are deploring the "high interest rates" which people today have to pay when they borrow—all due, naturally, to the Eisenhower hard money policy—and one of the boons they promise us, if elected, is cheap money.

Well, the First National City Bank of New York has just compiled a table showing interest rates around the world. It gives the rate for prime commercial loans, which is the cheapest money that can be borrowed by the biggest and best firms. The man who walks into a bank to borrow for his personal use will pay much more. And the table makes very interesting reading indeed.

It shows, first off, that the current 4-percent prime rate in the United States for borrowed money is the lowest in the world. In Great Britain, for example, the best borrowers pay as much as 7½ percent. In France, 7¼ percent. In Japan, 9 percent. There is no place where you can borrow money cheaper than right here.

Indeed, there are only two countries where the current prime rate even approaches the low level of the United States. These two—and we hope Senator KENNEDY will take note—are both "hard" money countries. The rate in Portugal is 4 percent, as here, and in Switzerland 4½ percent.

Mr. KENNEDY might also note that in the countries that have gone further in a socialistic planned economy, complete with welfare state, borrowed money is considerably more expensive than under our alleged high rates. In Norway the biggest and soundest borrowers pay 5½ percent; in Sweden 6½ percent.

But what really sends a chill down the spine is a look at the soaring prices for borrowed money in those countries which have deliberately, and diligently, followed cheap money policies. In Brazil and Paraguay the cheapest you can borrow is 12 percent. In Peru the best commercial loans cost 13½ percent. And in Chile the lowest rate is 15 percent.

These, mind you, are for loans on the best business security. The man who wants to borrow to buy a house or pay a hospital bill must pay 20 percent and up, if he can borrow at all. For once everyone realizes that a government is deliberately going to cheapen the money, interest rates soar in a desperate effort to keep up with the inflation.

So the moral in this little tour of the world, if it needs to be stated, is that for the people "cheap" money is the most expensive of all.

SOVIET EDUCATION

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, at the request of the Louisiana State University Alumni News magazine, I prepared an article on Soviet education and its implications for education in the United States.

I ask unanimous consent that my article, which appeared in the July issue of the Alumni News magazine, be printed at this point in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SOVIET EDUCATION: A THREAT AND A CHALLENGE

(By U.S. Senator HUBERT H. HUMPHREY)

Soviet sputniks and moon missiles have shocked Americans into the realization that our strength as a nation is being threatened by the inadequacies in our educational system. Russian students, we are told, are being rigorously trained in the sciences, mathematics, and languages, while our own students are handicapped by a lagging, underfinanced educational system.

Is a Russian education, then, so much better than an education obtainable in Louisiana, or in Minnesota, or any other part of our country? In some respects, it unquestionably is better. Certainly our best schools are just as good or better than the best the Russians have. Probably our worst schools are not as bad as the poorest of theirs. But viewing the school systems as a whole, it is obvious that millions of Russian children are getting the kind of educational opportunity and intellectual stimulation in certain areas of knowledge that only a few can get here. Their children are no brighter than ours, but more is expected of them.

There are many aspects of the Soviet educational system which I do not like. History taught according to the party line is, to me, not real history. Although the Russian student spends a considerable amount of time studying literature, he must interpret it according to party doctrine. The state and the party control how and what each student should be taught.

These are serious limitations in the Soviet school system. As long as they exist, the quality of general education in the Soviet Union must inevitably be impaired.

I do not think this should be used as an excuse, however, to ignore the virtues in the Soviet system, or to conclude that we have nothing to learn from it. Educational standards in the Soviet Union are in many ways very high. And—most important of all, perhaps—a conversation with any Russian, from Khrushchev to the man in the street, brings the conviction that they intend to make their schools even better.

Take a look at the Soviet budget. In 1959, the Russians allocated 94.4 billion rubles to educational and cultural needs. This figure represents 13.5 percent of the total budget. This is an amazingly high figure when you consider the enormous pressure on the Government for development in critical areas of the economy and for defense expenditures. It has been estimated that the Soviet expenditure for general educational purposes represents about 8 percent of their gross national product.

The Russians are now in the process of making substantial changes in their school system, which are designed to give students experience in practical work, in addition to their academic subjects. How successful they will be in accomplishing this dual purpose it is impossible to say at this time. But certainly their public statements indicate a general determination to maintain the highest possible scholastic standards.

Until the new reforms are fully in effect, many schoolchildren in the Soviet Union will continue to study under a system similar in structure to that in the United States. The elementary school includes the first through the fourth grades; the middle school covers grades 5, 6, and 7, and the secondary school includes grades 8, 9, and 10. Far from all students manage to complete their 10-year secondary schooling. Those who do, however, have been exposed to a full program of academic training, which is designed to prepare them for advanced study in a university or institute.

The workload in a Soviet school is heavy. Students attend classes 6 days a week. Those who have completed the 10-year general school have, therefore, spent about the same amount of time in class as our own children have in 12 years. This in itself would not be alarming if it meant that the more leisurely pace in this country resulted in the mastering of more difficult material. The opposite appears to be true. By the time the Russian student has completed 10 grades he has taken trigonometry, physics, and chemistry. These are not electives for him. They are requirements. And in order to get a certificate signifying his successful completion he must pass very tough examinations, some oral and some written, in each subject.

It is not only my opinion, but the opinion of American scholars and scientists who have studied these examinations, that very few of our students could pass the examinations in science and mathematics upon completion of high school. Even a first or second year college student studying mathematics would probably find the examination in his field a very challenging one.

Inferiority in the intelligence of our youth is not the answer. Instead, we are failing to give American students the opportunity to learn to their fullest capacities and needs. We are underrating our young people, and doing them an irreparable injustice by assuming that they are less capable of learning than their contemporaries in the Soviet Union and in Western Europe.

Most Americans who hear about how much science and mathematics the Soviet student is required to study believe that it has been at the sacrifice of instruction in the humanities. This does not appear to be true. Examination of Soviet curricula shows that the time allotted for sudy of the humanities has been about the same as that allotted to the sciences, mathematics and technical training. It is true that the content of many of these humanity courses is poor and badly distorted from our point of view. But the Russians have proved that it is possible to give extensive instruction in both areas if careful use is made of classroom time.

A student in the U.S.S.R. works hard. He does not have study periods during school hours in which to prepare his homework for the next day. Preparation must be done in the evenings, and the school libraries often remain open until late so that students may have access to the books they need.

In comparison, American students have a pretty easy time. Homework often is either light or nonexistent. Students can devote their evenings to TV or a basketball game and still get by.

I do not believe that the standards of classroom performance in the United States should be so high that recreational pursuits become impossible. But I do believe we can find a better balance than we have now. And I also believe that our students would react favorably to a little more intellectual challenge, a little more stimulation than they are getting.

Fundamental to the success of any school system, of course, is the caliber of the teachers in it. The Russians are making strenuous efforts to establish a high level of training and performance for the young men and women entering the teaching profession. Most startling, perhaps, is the fact that they no longer face the problem of a teacher shortage. In fact, the competition among students to attend teachers institutes is so rigorous that only one out of every five can be accepted. There are at least two important reasons for this. One is that, in general, there is no serious economic barrier for students who wish to go on to higher education. A large percentage of those who are preparing to enter teaching, as well as those going into other fields, are given stipends to cover living expenses while they are in the university or institute. Since institutions of higher education charge no tuition, most young people who attend them are able to do so without needing substantial financial resources of their own.

Equally important is the fact that the teaching profession is highly respected by the Russian people. A teacher in Russia commands a prominent position in community life. Compared to American teachers, he is poorly paid. But compared to others in the Soviet society, which, after all, is a more meaningful basis for comparison, he does quite well. Beginning teachers are often able to earn salaries equal to those of beginning doctors and engineers. They are eligible for periodic increases, according to length of service. Superior teachers also get higher salaries or a bonus.

One important measure that has been taken in the Soviet Union in recent years is the lengthening of the program of the teacher training institutes from 4 years to 5. This resulted from the conclusion of Russian educators that teachers, especially on the secondary level, need time not only to learn how to teach, but also to acquire a thorough mastery of their subject matter. The Russians do not intend to neglect either phase. Both the scope and quantity of training a prospective teacher gets are impressive. A teacher of mathematics, for example, is expected to have about as much specialized training in his field as the person going directly into production work. Nor does his training end with graduation. Various methods are employed to enable the teacher to keep up with developments in his field and improve his qualifications. This procedure of inservice training appears to be highly developed, and teachers are periodically sent back to school for refresher courses. They also maintain contact with their schools through correspondence, extension, and evening courses.

I do not want to be in the position of criticizing our own teaching profession. Most of our teachers are doing the best they can under very difficult circumstances. I believe most of them would be overjoyed to see a greater emphasis in this country on knowledge of subject matter, particularly at the secondary school level, when knowing how a subject should be taught is no substitute for mastery of the material.

The young people in this country who plan to enter the teaching profession deserve the best education possible. They should be provided with greater incentives to continue studies in their fields throughout their careers, and they should be given the opportunity to do so without making impossible financial sacrifices.

By pointing to these strong points in Soviet education, and some of our comparatively weak ones, I do not want to imply that I believe imitation of the Soviet system will solve our school problems. I do not want to see us become so frightened by sputniks and luniks that we begin to think that everything the Russians do is right and everything we are doing is wrong. Nothing could be more disastrous. I believe we should study the Soviet system. I believe we can learn something from it. But I do not believe we should copy it.

Perhaps to balance the picture I should point out that the Russians themselves find much to criticize in their own school system. Their newspapers regularly carry indignant complaints about the poor quality of teaching in some areas and about the nature of curricula. They, too, are puzzling over the problem of how much training a teacher should have and what kind of training it should be. Some of their problems are not too different from ours. One person writing to Izvestia, the official state newspaper, recently complained that the "present inadequate command of a foreign language on the part of secondary school graduates is largely due to the fact that sometimes (especially in the districts and rural areas) these subjects are taught by teachers who have had no special education." Some teachers, he states, are "unable to read a text correctly, to say nothing of the fact that they have not the slightest idea of correct pronunciation."

One of the Republic Ministers of Education stated in Pravda that many teachers are now doing a poor job. They have both "inadequate knowledge of subject and of teaching methods." Others have written that some Russian teachers have insufficient teacher training, and that teacher-training institutes should require more pedagogical courses. A director of a teachers' institute proposed last year that awarding the title of teacher and the issuance of diplomas to graduates should not be done until 2 years after graduation. He then suggested that during these 2 years teachers in specialized subjects should get additional experience for approximately 6 months on a collective farm, at a plant or in a scientific research institute. Only those who gave a good account of themselves during this time should then be given the title of teacher and a diploma. In this way, teachers' institutes would be protected from an influx of random persons. Only those who felt a calling for the teaching profession and were not afraid of difficulties would attend.

Another complaint which appeared some time ago in Izvestia should sound familiar to Americans. From Rostov Province came the lament that "conditions have not been equal for urban and rural schools. In our district, for example, there are only 2 pianos for 56 schools, whereas in an urban school one sometimes finds not only a piano but a large number of other musical instruments as well. The result is that even very talented children are sometimes unable to prove themselves in the rural schools."

These are only very limited samples of the problems which the Russians are facing in their school system. Their schools are far from perfect, as they themselves are willing to admit. Nevertheless, their accomplishments have been tremendous. Less than half a century ago a public school system as we know it was virtually nonexistent. It is an impressive fact that in this time the Soviet Union changed from a country with three-fourths of its population illiterate to one not only highly literate, but capable of producing engineers and scientists at a faster rate than we are now doing. This is an astounding achievement.

How have they been able to do it? The answer to this is complex, and involves questions of philosophy of government, the relationship of the state to the individual, and other problems too involved to go into here.

But basic to their success is the overwhelming dedication to education by the Russian people.

This, then, is the real challenge to us. We cannot meet it by simply copying their curriculum requirements or trying to match the numbers they are graduating each year from their universities and institutes in particular fields. Inevitably, we would always be a step behind.

I believe in our principles of democratic government and a free society. I am proud of the American heritage and American accomplishments. But I think we must all remind ourselves that the strength of our society and the accomplishments we have wrought have grown out of the dedication to knowledge, understanding, and education, that our countrymen have had in the past—a dedication we must show once again.

If we revive this dedication, as we must, we shall not have schools equal to those of the Russians. Ours will be better.

In this case, dedication cannot be expressed only in terms of dollars and cents. We must use our wealth. But we also must use all the thought and foresight that we can muster.

I am not referring to the kind of thought that goes in circles, and ends with the conclusion that the problem is so vast and so difficult that we have to study and restudy it before we can do anything at all. We need thought that results in plans, and programs, and action.

There is no simple answer to the problem of what action should be taken to meet the needs of our educational system. But if we accept the thesis that a basic responsibility of our schools is to teach our young people to think—constructively, independently and imaginatively—then I believe a number of measures suggest themselves.

First of all, we must strengthen our curriculums. Better course selection must be offered, and requirements must be made more rigorous. At present we are faced with a situation where a course in elementary physics is not even taught in 12,000 of our 21,000 high schools. It is often impossible for students, even in some of our better schools, to take more than 2 years of foreign language. In some, no foreign language is taught at all.

Course deficiencies such as these must be eliminated. The solution will depend on the local situation. In rural areas, consolidation of schools may be necessary in order to make broad course offerings feasible. In some cases, we will simply have to spend more money. In others, a reallocation of resources may suffice.

It is not easy to define what is "essential" in terms of today's schools. Basically, however, I believe our talented young men and women should be taking more science courses, including physics and chemistry, along with at least 3, preferably 4 years of mathematics. Language requirements should be revised so that students get a useful reading and speaking knowledge. This would mean at least 4 years' study of one language.

Not everyone will be able to do equally well in these subjects. Therefore, I suggest that courses be organized to challenge the bright student to superior performance. Slower students should be taught at a rate commensurate with their ability. Obviously, each school or each school district must select the means of doing this which is best adapted to its particular situation. But we must realize that we cannot continue to neglect all of our students by concentrating on the mythical "average."

But every student should get a thorough grounding in English grammar and literature through his secondary school training. We must expand requirements in the humanities and the social sciences beyond the present general requirements.

The urge to compete with Soviet education in science, mathematics, and foreign languages must not blind us to the profound importance of the humanities. The liberal arts—literature, history, philosophy—are essential studies if we are to preserve our perspective in a rapidly changing world. Certainly we need more and better scientists and engineers. But we will also need more and better teachers, economists, lawyers, community leaders, and statesmen. And to preserve and extend our American traditions and our culture, we need artists, theologians, and philosophers.

Each child who demonstrates the capacity to do college work should have the opportunity to continue his education. This means we must greatly expand our scholarship programs in all fields of study. Scholarship aid must be made available not only in the sciences and mathematics, but also in the humanities. I supported the inclusion of a scholarship program in the National Defense Education Act of 1958. Unfortunately, this provision was not included in the version of the bill which finally passed. I hope this situation will quickly be corrected. I, myself, took a step in this direction during the last session of Congress by introducing a student aid bill, which would establish a Federal scholarship program.

The need for such a scholarship program is beyond doubt. The Office of Education in the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare made a study which shows that in 1957–58, more than 70,000 qualified students who requested financial aid from colleges and universities were denied assistance. Under my bill, at least 46,000 worthy young people each year would be helped to enter the university or college of their choice. In addition, the institutions which these students attended would be compensated in part for the costs of providing education to the scholarship holder. In view of the burden of swollen enrollments, this provision is vitally important. Our institutions of higher learning must be assured of adequate means to maintain a high level of instruction.

I believe we must improve the caliber of our teaching profession. We desperately need more and better teachers. Higher salaries are part of the answer to this problem. I have consistently sponsored and supported legislation in Congress to make this possible. Along with higher salaries, a revision of standards and requirements for teachers may be equally essential. Teachers in our secondary schools, especially, should have a thorough mastery of their specialized subjects. Prospective teachers should not be discouraged by being forced to meet unrealistic and unnecessary State and local certification requirements. A person who is poorly trained in his field, but has taken the specified teachers college courses should not automatically be favored over the expert who has not.

As I stated earlier, I believe our teachers should have the opportunity to improve their qualifications. Again, Congress has taken a small step in this direction by establishing a program for advanced training of language teachers under the National Defense Education Act. Much more remains to be done in this field.

Finally, I believe that in order to improve our school facilities throughout the country, we must improve our methods of financing them. Today we are faced with the dilemma that we simply do not have enough schoolrooms or laboratory facilities to take care of our young people. Many local and State governments—and many school districts at their bonded debt limits—do not have the tax base to meet the ever-growing demand. The solution of this dilemma requires Federal aid for school construction. I do not like to see any student receive an inferior education just because his parents happen to live in an area where there is insufficient wealth to build and maintain a decent school. A construction program on a nationwide basis is essential to make educational equality a possibility throughout the United States. Only the Federal Government has the resources to support a national effort in education.

Our schools would get a tremendous boost by action in Congress on a good national school assistance bill. We must provide Federal aid for State and local school systems, valiantly struggling along with overcrowded classrooms and low-paid teachers. Halfhearted, halfway measures will not solve our educational problems. Our children will not have the kind of education they need for the space age unless they have excellent, well-paid teachers, well equipped classrooms, libraries, laboratories and health facilities in every school community in the Nation.

Each bill providing for Federal aid to our schools must have one common provision—an explicit prohibition against any Federal direction, supervision or control over the personnel, curriculum or program of any school system. Such a prohibition is an indispensable provision in any school legislation which Congress considers. It is included in my own bills, and in those which I support.

The suggestions given here are not in themselves the final answer to our educational needs. They are not even my own final answer. Each improvement that is made will pave the way for an even greater improvement. Our educational system cannot be static. It must develop and grow within the context of our free, democratic society. Our American schools have served us well in past years. They have perpetuated our democratic ideals, and have made it possible for the United States to achieve a standard of living unequaled in the world. We must not throw over this glorious past. We should, however, strive to build upon it. An education that was good enough for our fathers is not good enough for our children. Our country faces a physical and moral challenge unmatched in its history. The educational needs of our children are therefore greater than ever before. We must meet these needs with courage, determination and action.

THE DEMOCRATIC CANDIDATES—A RECORD OF ACHIEVEMENT

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, Walter Lippmann, in a column published in the Los Angeles Times following the Democratic National Convention, summarized the excellent record of experience and leadership of our Democratic candidates, Senators KENNEDY and JOHNSON, in both domestic and foreign affairs.

Mr. Lippmann emphasized, too, that Senator JOHNSON, as the majority leader in the Democratic Congresses which have passed two major civil rights bills, is an excellent complement to the Democratic Party's exceptional and forthright civil rights platform plank.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Lippmann's lucid and objective appraisal of the Democratic ticket be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Los Angeles Times, July 20, 1960]

JOHNSON'S EFFECTIVENESS ON CIVIL RIGHTS WILL STRENGTHEN KENNEDY

(By Walter Lippmann)

Boring though so much of a convention is to the spectators, no one is likely soon to invent a substitute for it.

Behind all the hoopla a convention is the way by which the men who have political power in their locality meet and confer face to face.

They have to do more than choose a candidate for President. They have also to approve a platform and to agree to a Vice President. They have to coordinate these three elements—the two candidates and the platform.

The Democrats did this by nominating JOHNSON after they had taken KENNEDY and a platform which in its controversial plank is addressed to the Northern States.

A combination of this kind, which each party seeks in each convention, could not be worked out if the men who have the political power did not all come together in one city.

JOHNSON was nominated by acclamation because the political bosses of the big Northern States agreed with KENNEDY that he added the most strength to the ticket. The civil rights plank in the platform is a formidable set of declarations and pledges, calling for much more moral and even legal intervention by the President than the South has known since the end of Reconstruction.

KENNEDY's choice of JOHNSON cannot fairly, I think, be interpreted as meaning that he is nullifying the platform, that he means to run on one kind of civil rights plank in the North and another in the South.

For JOHNSON is a southerner but not a sectionalist. More than any other man in public life, more than any politician since the Civil War, he has on the race problem been the most effective mediator between the North and the South. He is the man who induced the Senate to accept the civil rights legislation which strikes at the disfranchisement of southern Negroes.

JOHNSON is, in fact, aware of and ready for the advances toward equality which the platform describes. But no one knows better than he how much of and how fast an advance the changing sentiment of the South is ready to accept.

The problem of accommodating the North and the South on the race question is a problem in both parties. NIXON, naturally enough, has hopes in the South. KENNEDY is a Catholic, he is eastern and urban, the platform goes far on civil rights and it goes farther on the welfare measures than conservative southerners like.

But NIXON cannot run in the South as being softer than KENNEDY on the issue of civil rights. For if he does, NIXON will be in trouble in the Northern States.

It is probably true, as many good observers have been saying, that events abroad, which cannot now be foreseen, may decide the contest between KENNEDY and NIXON.

As of now NIXON's main talking point is that for nearly 8 years he has had access to all the information and has been in a position to hear the arguments which have led up to the position of the Eisenhower administration.

KENNEDY's main talking point is that in these 8 years the American position, relative to the Soviet Union, has declined—and that it must be due to a failure to develop American power and to lack of wisdom and skill in conducting our affairs.

In my view, KENNEDY has the better of NIXON on these points. As for their comparative experience, while KENNEDY has not been on the inside of the Eisenhower administration, he has been a member of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations. He is, therefore, far from being an ignorant outsider.

What is more, he is far less committed than is NIXON by the mistakes and omissions of the past, and he is much freer to set in motion that reappraisal and revision of the Acheson-Dulles system of alliances, which is now inevitable and imperative.

To be 4 years older means nothing when both men are in the prime of their lives. As for political experience and maturity, the KENNEDY-JOHNSON combination is a highly professional one.

In domestic affairs, their combined experience would be hard to match. In foreign affairs, KENNEDY, who knows the score himself, has within reach a great many men, beginning with Stevenson and Fulbright and Bowles and including many of the ablest members of the Foreign Service. These men know very well indeed what the world is like today.

There is then no danger that our affairs will fall into the hands of inexperienced amateurs.

TRIBUTE TO SENATOR ESTES KEFAUVER

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, the people of Tennessee cast an overwhelming vote of confidence for their senior Senator, our colleague and my good and valued friend, ESTES KEFAUVER, in the Tennessee Democratic primary last week.

Senator KEFAUVER went back to his State and talked to his fellow Tennesseans, in his honest, direct, persuasive way, about the great issues of our times. He took his record in this body back to Tennessee and explained it to his neighbors, the men and women who selected him to represent them. His opposition attempted, with a demagogic appeal to sectionalism and prejudice, to distort that record and to discredit the work of the great Tennessee Senator for his State, our Nation, and all the peoples of the world.

Mr. President, as a friend and colleague, it is a privilege and pleasure to pay tribute to the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER] and to congratulate him on his landslide victory.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an editorial from the Milwaukee Journal of August 5, 1960, summing up the national political impact of the Senator's triumph, be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Milwaukee (Wis.) Journal, Aug. 5, 1960]

KEFAUVER'S IMPRESSIVE WIN

Senator ESTES KEFAUVER'S smashing primary triumph in Tennessee over Judge Andrew T. Taylor marks a victory over some of the ugliest forces in the South and in the Nation.

The Kefauver opponent was a States Righter and a racial segregationist of the narrowest dimensions. His appeal was to the most reactionary and backward looking voters in the Volunteer State. He urged a return to regionalism and traditionalism for Tennessee and the South and isolationism for the Nation. He stooped to the worst demagoguery, accusing KEFAUVER of supporting creeping socialism and black supremacy, of deserting Dixie and of being a one worlder.

KEFAUVER'S landslide win is expected to have far reaching political results.

It will help to slow down, if not end, talk of southern rebellion against the national Democratic ticket of KENNEDY and JOHNSON and the 1960 civil rights plank. It will encourage Democratic hopes of holding the South in November. It should help to speed antisegregation moves, particularly in the border States, and should encourage moderates throughout the South.

Finally, it assures the return of a competent Senator to Washington for 6 more years.

PHILIP B. PERLMAN AND LELAND OLDS: OUTSTANDING SERVICE TO AMERICA

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, last week America lost two of her most devoted and brilliant public servants, with the death of Philip B. Perlman, on July 31, and Leland Olds, whose death came on August 4.

It is an honor to pay tribute to these men.

Only last month Philip Perlman was cochairman of the platform committee of the Democratic National Convention. The document drafted by his committee and adopted by our party is easily the most progressive and outstanding platform ever written by any party. Clear in that platform is the devotion to human rights which our party champions, and which Philip Perlman so eloquently defended as Solicitor General of the United States. Mr. Perlman's brief against racially restrictive covenants on real estate is a classic document in our struggle to assure all Americans equal rights under the law and equality of opportunity. Philip Perlman won that case with the Supreme Court's 6 to 0 decision holding that such covenants could not be enforced by the courts. As Solicitor General, Philip Perlman won all but 12 of the 61 cases he argued before the High Court.

Leland Olds served for 10 years as a member of the Federal Power Commission, and during the major portion of that time as Commission Chairman. He was devoted to the public interest and devoted all his energies as FPC member and Chairman to guaranteeing that the best interests of all the people were served by utility companies. Leland Olds sought to preserve genuine and effective free enterprise competition among utilities. But for private power interests seeking monopoly control of power facilities, competition was fine for the other fellow but not for utilities. It was a contradiction, certainly, that the more conservative elements in our national life who so bitterly opposed Leland Olds most often paid lipservice to the idea of competition as the cornerstone of free enterprise, but more often fought practical measures to strengthen this system.

It is interesting to note, too, that Leland Olds was a pioneer of the St. Lawrence Seaway. Back in 1941, he helped to negotiate the basic United States-Canadian agreement to deepen the waterway and develop hydroelectric power as part of the project.

After the interests with whom Mr. Olds clashed were able to block his reappointment to the FPC by President Truman, Mr. Truman continued to use his talents and experience on the Water Resources Policy Commission and an Interior Department study of New England resource development. However, I think a most significant sentence in the New York Times report of Leland Olds' death was:

> Since 1952, Mr. Olds had been out of public life.

The regulatory commissions since 1952 have not been notably concerned with the general good of our people as their most important objective—the spirit of Leland Olds has been sorely lacking in these bodies.

Mr. President, the deaths of Philip Perlman and Leland Olds are reminders to all of us in public life that we must continually renew our dedication to securing the human rights of all and to guaranteeing that our Federal Government serve the interests of all our people, and never the interests of one group at the expense of others.

DAVID B. KARRICK

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, our morning hour was so taken up with debate that I did not have a chance to make a comment which I now wish to make in the RECORD concerning the death of my good friend, David Karrick, a former member of the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia. His death came very suddenly, as a very great shock to all of us who knew him. He was a very delightful gentleman; a witty, wise, and very able person. In recent years he devoted all of his time to the Nation's business, as one of the three District Commissioners. In that capacity he rendered extraordinarily able service and made a remarkably fine place for himself in the hearts and minds of all the residents of the District.

After serving some years as a member of the Commission, David Karrick was appointed Ambassador to Ecuador, and was about to take over his duties when he was suddenly seized with a heart attack and expired. This is a very heavy loss to the District of Columbia and to a very wide circle of friends of David Karrick. I take this opportunity to express to his close friends—of whom I am one—and to members of his family my deep sympathy and understanding of their feelings at this difficult time.

RESOLUTIONS OF THE WEST VIRGINIA BANKERS ASSOCIATION

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I wish to invite the attention of the Members of this body to the fact that oftimes we hear from our constituency, either from an individual citizen or an organization of which a citizen is a member, expressing a viewpoint or a conviction as to a pending matter being considered by a committee or by the Senate. Very often we receive these pleas, in some instances, or representations, in other instances, after the fact.

A Member of the Senate, properly comes to a certain conclusion, after having heard the witnesses and having listened to the testimony. The Senator makes his determination on a specific matter of proposed legislation after perhaps a long period of time, and very often—I say this in no criticism whatsoever—the Senator does not have the counsel of the people back home before the fact. This is very important.

Often we receive a telegram the night before a vote on an amendment is to take place, or the night before a vote on passage of proposed legislation is programed, expressing a viewpoint for or against a bill or a proposal. Seldom does this give to the Senator the advice and the aid which I think he not only really needs but also would welcome if received in sufficient time to be carefully evaluated.

In this connection, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the resolutions passed unanimously by the West Virginia Bankers Association on July 16, 1960, in reference to proposed legislation which is still under consideration by the Congress, be printed in the RECORD at this point, along with the letter of transmittal from the executive manager of the West Virginia Bankers Association.

There being no objection, the letter and resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WEST VIRGINIA BANKERS ASSOCIATION,
Charleston, W. Va., August 1, 1960.

Hon. JENNINGS RANDOLPH,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR RANDOLPH: Please be advised that the enclosed resolutions were presented to and adopted by the members of the West Virginia Bankers Association at their annual convention held in Charleston, W. Va., on Saturday, July 16, 1960.

Sincerely,

FRANK N. GANS,
Executive Manager.

REPORT OF RESOLUTIONS COMMITTEE

To the President and Members of the West Virginia Bankers Association:

The resolutions committee appointed by the president convened at a dinner meeting in Charleston on Friday, June 17, 1960, for the purpose of formulating resolutions for consideration and action by this, the 1960 annual meeting of the association.

Your committee accordingly hereby submits and unanimously recommends adoption of the following resolutions:

"First. Be it resolved, That this association favors the adoption of legislation by the Congress to repeal the Postal Savings Act (39 U.S. Code 751), together with all amendments thereto and regulations thereunder, in order to effect the closing of the Postal Savings System.

"Second. Be it further resolved, That this association does hereby reaffirm its strong approval and support of the principles and objectives of the Mason bill (H.R. 7950) now pending before the Ways and Means Committee in the House of Representatives of the United States, as a means of achieving a fair distribution of Federal income taxes as between commercial banks and savings and loan associations and mutual savings banks; that the previous support by the American Bankers Association of this bill be commended and approved; and that said association and others interested in the passage of such legislation be urged to continue to take positive and aggressive steps in order to secure favorable committee and congressional action thereon before the 1961 Congress.

"Third. Be it further resolved, That this association unanimously favors and recommends passage of proper legislation by the Congress to remove the arbitrary 1918 ceiling of 4¼-percent interest on Government bonds of 5 years or over, as heretofore recommended by the executive and Treasury departments of the Government, this association believing that such statutory limitation only complicates the problem of debt management, thereby placing the Treasury in the position of adopting undesirable financing practices.

"Fourth. Be it further resolved, That this association is strongly opposed to all attempts which would weaken the financial strength of our national economy through deficit financing.

"Tenth. Be it further resolved, That certified copies of resolutions 'First,' 'Second,' 'Third,' and 'Fourth' of this report, if adopted, shall be forwarded by the executive manager to each of the Senators and Congressmen from West Virginia, reflecting the position of this association with respect thereto and urging their active interest in and support of such legislation."

Respectfully submitted,

W. T. JUDY,
Chairman, Vice President and Trust Officer, Kanawha Banking & Trust Co., Charleston, W. Va.

JOHN D. HOBLITZELL, Jr.,
Executive Vice President, First National Bank, Bluefield, W. Va.

JOHN J. NASH,
Executive Vice President, Half Dollar Trust & Savings Bank, Wheeling, W. Va.

G. W. RAIKE,
President, the National Bank of Logan, Logan, W. Va.

AMERICAN BATTLE MONUMENTS COMMISSION

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, it was recently my privilege to represent the Senate along with our distinguished colleague the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. MARTIN] on the official delegation of the American Battle Monuments Commission to dedicate six of the World War II American military cemeteries in Europe, one in Carthage, north Africa, and a monument in Brest, France.

The responsibility for constructing and maintaining our military cemeteries and memorials abroad, as well as certain monuments and military cemeteries in our own country, has since 1923 belonged to the American Battle Monuments Commission.

This Commission has done an outstanding job. The men and women who have served on the Commission through the years deserve the commendation and thanks of all Americans.

Mr. President, may I state the names of the members of the American Battle Monuments Commission: Gen. Jacob L. Devers, Chairman; Adm. Thomas C. Kinkaid, Vice Chairman; Leslie L. Biffle, Gen. Alexander A. Vandegrift; Charles E. Potter; John Phillips; Mrs. Wendell L. Willkie; Gen. Carl Spaatz; Brig. Gen. Benjamin O. Davis; Forest A. Harness; and Maj. Gen. Thomas North, secretary. Gen. George C. Marshall was formerly Chairman of this Commission.

During the time I was with the delegation, it was not possible for me to visit all permanent oversea cemeteries wherein more than 124,000 valiant Americans, who gave their lives for their country and the cause of freedom in two tragic world wars, have found their final resting place.

However, at those cemeteries which the delegation visited, I was deeply moved by the tender care and attention given to them and the beauty and serenity which surrounds them. A white marble headstone marks each grave—a star of David for those of the Jewish faith, and a cross for all others. On the walls of the memorial in each are inscribed the names of the missing. A small nondenominational chapel forms part of each cemetery memorial.

In addition to attending dedication ceremonies in France and Italy, I was asked to deliver the address of dedication at the north Africa cemetery in Tunisia, located near the ruins of ancient Carthage, about 10 miles from the capital city, Tunis. Here rest 3,074 of our dead, and on the Wall of the Missing are engraved the names of 3,724 who gave their lives in the service of their country but whose remains were never recovered or identified.

It lies amidst beautiful surroundings, and all Americans have reason to be proud of the noble work of the American Battle Monuments Commission.

Mr. President, during the Second World War, I served for a time in the north African theater of operations. The brave Americans who fought and died there were engaged in one of the great military campaigns in history against a mighty army commanded by one whom many consider to be the outstanding German general of the last war, General Rommel.

Our victory was no easy triumph. To achieve it cost the lives of many thousands of gallant Americans. To these fallen heroes our Nation will forever owe a debt of gratitude.

Perhaps I can best express—though words will never fully do so—my feelings of humility and gratitude on that occasion by the brief remarks I made at that time. At the request of General Devers, I ask unanimous consent that these remarks be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks today.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Ohio? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, on more than one occasion in recent years it has been requested of Postmaster General Arthur E. Summerfield and officials of the Post Office Department that a commemorative postage stamp be issued honoring the magnificent work of the American Battle Monuments Commission. These repeated requests have not been complied with.

In fact, they have been denied. I am unaware of the reasons for the refusal to comply. To me it seems that this would be a proper recognition of outstanding service of the distinguished members of the American Battle Monuments Commission. It is difficult for me to comprehend why Post Office Department officials, and why Postmaster General Arthur Summerfield, would deny and did deny these requests, while at the same time the Post Office Department has been issuing stamps commemorating everything from the petroleum industry to gardening and horticulture.

There is nothing improper—in fact, it is commendable—in the fact that many aspects of our national and international life are recognized by the Post Office Department.

Among those singled out in the past few years for a commemorative stamp issue have been gardening and horticulture, the Gunston Hall bicentennial, the Mackinac Bridge, the Fort Duquesne bicentennial, the silver centennial, air balloon Jupiter, the pan-American games, and the petroleum industry.

Mr. President, I think the petroleum industry has been taking very good care of itself without having a commemorative stamp issued for it by Postmaster General Summerfield.

There have been commemorative stamp issues for dental health, the Olympic winter games, Dr. Ephraim McDowell, Hermitage Coil, the Fifth World Forestry Congress, Virginia City Silver Centennial, and many others.

No doubt some were deserving of this recognition. Why others received such recognition can be seriously questioned. I do assert, Mr. President, that it is unfortunate that the Battle Monuments Commission, which is certainly more deserving than most of those I have mentioned, has not been granted this same distinction. For over 30 years it has worked without fanfare or publicity at the task of caring for the final resting places of thousands of Americans who gave their lives for their country—the sons, husbands, fathers, and brothers of millions of Americans.

Mr. President, I believe it is time that Postmaster General Summerfield reconsider his past decisions. I feel the time is long overdue for greater national recognition of the outstanding men and women who are serving, and who have served through the years, in the work of the American Battle Monuments Commission.

A commemorative postage stamp will, in a small way, offer to them the thanks and appreciation of their Government and of the American people.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

ADDRESS OF U.S. SENATOR STEPHEN M. YOUNG AT DEDICATION OF U.S. MILITARY CEMETERY, CARTHAGE, TUNISIA, JULY 21, 1960, UNDER AUSPICES OF AMERICAN BATTLE MONUMENTS COMMISSION

Today we attest deference and devotion and manifest our affection and love for those Americans who lost their lives in defense of their country and to preserve freedom for their fellow Americans.

Today we dedicate this burial ground.

This is the final resting place of 3,074 young men who came from far away America.

They responded to their country's call. They wanted nothing better than to complete their education and to follow peaceful pursuits.

On a day of infamy the Japanese launched a sneak attack against our Pacific fleet, and at Pearl Harbor 3,000 young Americans lost their lives, almost without warning or time for resistance.

Immediately, Hitler's Germany joined its ally and then the United States declared a state of war to exist between the United States and imperial Japan and Hitler's Germany.

The young men buried here are beloved sons of our free Nation. The love and gratitude of their countrymen will ever remain with them.

Here are 27 acres—a corner of Tunisia that will be forever American.

Hundreds of years from now, in far places people will speak of them reverently and recall that they and others turned back the tide of dictatorship aggression and restored to men and women the world over their simple dignity as creatures of the Almighty.

Those who are buried beneath this sacred soil, could they speak, would ask us the living to try to build from the remnants of the past conflict, the peace and the greatness they desired for their children and their children's children.

We wish fervently that thousands of American fathers and mothers were with us today as we dedicate this place of beauty in this new nation, Tunisia, which was forged in freedom and has taken its proud place in the community of nations of the free world. We dedicate this cemetery also to 3,724 Americans missing in their country's service whose names are engraved on the Wall of the Missing, and to 3,074 Americans buried here.

These honored dead and their comrades who lived to return, fought against the famed Afrika Corps of Adolf Hitler. Their offensive in north Africa was the forerunner of offensives in Sicily, Italy, France, and in the far Pacific. They formed a part of the greatest military, naval, and air forces ever gathered together under the bending sky of God.

They and millions of other Americans left their comfortable homes and loved ones in response to a grave national duty. They taught a lesson that dictators of aggressor nations should never forget.

Although it is to the dead that we dedicate this place of serene beauty, it is in the minds and hearts of the living that its lesson must be indelibly stamped. The living owe their legacy of freedom to those who paid the ultimate price in freedom's name.

We sometimes forget how much we owe to these young men who lie silently here and in other military cemeteries abroad and at home.

In reality, our debt to them commands us to guard vigorously and vigilantly the liberty and welfare of the nation for which they died.

To each generation it seems the lessons and responsibilities of freedom must be taught anew, if freedom is to endure. Those young men buried here learned the responsibilities of liberty before their time. It was they who paid with their lives for the lesson they learned. Many were carefree boys who became men overnight and kept their rendezvous with death.

It is for us, the living, to assure through our dedication and devotion to peace that succeeding generations will learn the lesson of liberty not on the battleground, but in the classrooms in the communities, in the homes and in their places of worship.

In memory of those who in their turn answered "here" to their nation's call and sacrificed their lives, let us have assurance that future generations will receive a new impulse of dedication to peace and good will and will guard with zeal the liberty for which these young men paid the supreme price.

We must hope and firmly believe that the supreme sacrifices these young men made will be understood, will be appreciated, will be remembered and will become part of the heritage and tradition of free people everywhere.

The mother heart of the world is beating for an end of all wars. There are but two choices for humanity: on the one hand, a continuation of the dark record of centuries of war; on the other hand, idealism with its possibilities of peace and happiness.

Thousands of the flower of the world's young manhood laid down their lives as the seal of the pledge to make an end to war. We must all strive to redeem that pledge.

Thrice obligated are we: To unborn generations, to the living, and to the high-souled youth who gave their lives to make the world safe for a better civilization.

It is more important than ever before that we keep vivid in our minds the tragedy of World War II, and the sacrifices made by the courageous young men buried here and elsewhere throughout the world, during the most devastating war in the history of the world.

Events of the past decade have drawn us at times perilously close to a third world war—dreadful beyond imagination to conceive.

This is a critical period in the destiny of free men everywhere. The free peoples of the world must be strengthened and defended. The United Nations must be fostered. Our relationships with our allies must be stanchly upheld. The hour is late.

Tyranny and oppression again stalk across the world. Violence has become an international philosophy. Tension grips mankind. We live in a grim period of international anarchy.

What the future holds, no person can predict. But let us hazard one guess: that democratic institutions—for which these men fought and died—will outlast tyranny, aggression and oppression. Human yearning for freedom and dignity will endure long after repressive Communist ideologies have become but memories.

It may be that we have become complacent despite the death and destruction of World War II, which brought sorrow into practically every community in America.

Millions of our young men gave their best years, their happiness and hopes—those buried here gave their all—to the dream of freedom. There can be only one compensation for the priceless days, months and years gone forever. The only compensation for those who laid down their lives is the hope that the promise of democracy will endure.

The sacrifices of those buried here must not be in vain. The glowing hope which sustained them in combat should not be betrayed by those for whom they fought, or by any future generation of Americans.

Those buried here became men before their time. We honor them. They lived through days and nights when they thought the last vestige of sanity, decency and kindness had disappeared altogether from the face of the world. They witnessed the creation of manmade ruins far worse than Pompeii or ancient Carthage. Nature and time never equaled the destructiveness of man.

As we dedicate this cemetery today to the memory of these beloved Americans who rest here, we must rededicate ourselves to the proposition that the horrors of war must never again afflict mankind. Only thus can we repay, to some extent, those who repose here in eternal sleep.

WASHINGTON: A MODERN GUIDE TO THE NATION'S CAPITAL

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I have recently been reading a worthwhile book entitled "Washington: A Modern Guide to the Nation's Capital," written by Michael Frome. His Washington is alive with the spirit of George Washington, who chose the site of the National Capital; of Abraham Lincoln, whose career is traced from his arrival as President-elect until his tragic assassination; of the present, when the Capital, as the author observes, "is in the midst of the most dramatic transformation since George Washington and Pierre Charles L'Enfant raised it out of a mud puddle," and even of the future, which is foreseen in exciting, changing dimensions.

With 6 million or more visitors yearly and a continual influx of new residents, this informative and entertaining companion is a welcome addition to the scene.

A RESOLUTION SUPPORTING A U.N. FOOD AND FIBER PROGRAM

Mr. FULBRIGHT obtained the floor.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield for the purpose of Senators making insertions and announcements without losing my right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Yesterday in his special message to the Congress the President of the United States made specific reference to a legislative proposal that has been before this body many times. Here is the President's specific request for congressional action:

> A proposal to be presented in September before the General Assembly of the United Nations, whereby we and other fortunate nations can, together, make greater use of our combined agricultural abundance to help feed the hungry of the world. The United Nations provides a multilateral forum admirably suited to initiate consideration of this effort.
> I consider it important that Congress approve a resolution endorsing such a program before the United Nations Assembly convenes.

Sometimes I get a strange impression of moving in a sort of dreamlike atmosphere. The requests by the President and his admonitions to Congress seem to be made without reference to the long and varied legislative history of these proposals. As I stated in the Senate on June 22 of this year, I am delighted that the administration finally favors our proposal to establish an international food and raw material reserve under the auspices of the United Nations. Over a period of many years a number of Democratic Senators have felt that this was a worthy proposal.

Our dear colleague from Montana [Mr. MURRAY] introduced the world food bank proposal in the 83d Congress, and again in the 84th Congress. The senior Senator from Minnesota is proud to have been one of the cosponsors of Senate Resolution 86, which was submitted on March 30, 1955. The senior Senator from Minnesota is also proud to have been chairman of the subcommittee that held thorough hearings in May of 1956 on Senate Resolution 86, calling for the establishment of the United Nations food and fiber reserve, and a similar measure sponsored by our late and beloved colleague, Senator Kerr Scott, of North Carolina.

As a result of the hearings, the Committee on Foreign Relations designated me to report to the Senate, Senate Resolution 316, the committee resolution, stating it to be the policy of Congress that the United States should participate with other nations under the auspices of the United Nations in the Food and Agricultural Organization and other specialized international agencies in establishing an International Food and Raw Materials Reserve, under U.N. auspices, as I have said. I have before me a copy of the resolution that was reported, and I ask unanimous consent that the text of the resolution appear at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 316) was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

> Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the President should explore with other nations the establishment of an International Food and Raw Materials Reserve under the auspices of the United Nations and related international organizations for the purpose of acquiring and storing in appropriate countries raw or processed farm products and other raw materials, exclusive of minerals, with a view to their use in—

(1) preventing extreme price fluctuations in the international market in these commodities;

(2) preventing famine and starvation;

(3) helping absorb temporary market surpluses of farm products and other raw materials (exclusive of minerals);

(4) economic and social development programs formulated in cooperation with other appropriate international agencies.

Participation by the United States in such an International Food and Raw Materials Reserve shall be contingent upon statutory authorization or treaty approval, as may be appropriate.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Due to strong opposition from the Republican minority, this proposal, approved by the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, never came to the Senate floor for debate and vote. At the very time the United Nations Economic and Social Council was debating this question in Geneva, the U.S. representative at the Geneva meeting expressed the official opposition of the United States to the proposal which the President of the United States now—and the same President then—vigorously opposed.

However, to document fully the attitude of the U.S. Senate, I should add that the mutual security authorization bill of 1956, as passed by the Senate, included a request to the executive branch to take the initiative in negotiations for the establishment of a World Food Bank or an International Food and Raw Materials Reserve. I offered that amendment. It was adopted. The administration again expressed strong disapproval, and this section was deleted from the bill in conference at the instance of the President and the State Department.

I do not recite the history of this proposal in either partisanship or anger. It is, however, my desire that the record shall be clear. This is a worthy proposal, and I wish to commend the President for at long last, in the final days of his administration, supporting a proposal which some of us supported 5 years ago. This same proposal has been repeatedly made in the past. The U.S. Senate has acted in the affirmative, expressing its approval. I hope that the Senate will take action on it during this session as requested now, rather belatedly, by the President. I am in hearty support, and I welcome the support of the President of the United States of a proposal which has already once been passed by the Senate. I wish that the President would review other Democratic proposals made in the past 8 years and find it in his heart to support them as he has this one.

I send to the desk a resolution which will carry out the sentiments and the recommendation of the President. It is the same resolution as that which was previously submitted.

I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be printed at this point in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

The resolution (S. Res. 357) submitted by Mr. HUMPHREY, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the President should explore with other nations the establishment of an International Food and Raw Materials Reserve under the auspices of the United Nations and related international organizations for the purpose of acquiring and storing in appropriate countries raw or processed farm products and other raw materials, exclusive of minerals, with a view to their use in—

(1) preventing extreme price fluctuations in the international market in these commodities;

(2) preventing famine and starvation;

(3) helping absorb temporary market surpluses of farm products and other raw materials (exclusive of minerals);

(4) economic and social development programs formulated in cooperation with other appropriate international agencies.

Participation by the United States in such an International Food and Raw Materials Reserve shall be contingent upon statutory authorization or treaty approval, as may be appropriate.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I thank the Senator from Arkansas for his kindness and consideration.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. On the subject on which the Senator from Minnesota has just spoken, I have prepared a statement and ask unanimous consent that it be inserted in the body of the RECORD at this point, as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR FULBRIGHT

Among the many catchall recommendations made by the President in his recent message to the Congress was one that brought back memories to me. The President stated that he would ask the Congress to endorse, before the U.N. Assembly convenes in September, a proposal to be presented "whereby we and other fortunate nations can, together, make greater use of our combined agricultural abundance to help feed the hungry of the world." He went on to say that "the United Nations provides a multilateral forum admirably suited to initiate consideration of this effort."

This idea is not new to the Committee on Foreign Relations nor to the Senate. The only thing new is the administration's embracing of it.

In 1956, the committee wrote into the Mutual Security Act of that year a section expressing the sense of the Congress "that the President should explore with other nations the establishment of an International Food and Raw Materials Reserve under the auspices of the United Nations and related international organizations for the purpose of acquiring and storing in appropriate countries raw or processed farm products and other raw materials, exclusive of minerals, with a view to their use in—

(1) preventing extreme price fluctuations in the international market in these commodities;

(2) preventing famine and starvation;

(3) helping absorb temporary market surpluses of farm products and other raw materials (exclusive of minerals);

(4) economic and social development programs formulated in cooperation with other appropriate international agencies.

This proposed new section was based on Senate Resolution 86, which had been introduced by our beloved senior Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY] for himself and 22 other Senators. Hearings were held on the resolution by a subcommittee headed by the able senior Senator from Minnesota. In support of the proposal appeared representatives of the National Farmers Union, the United Automobile Workers of America, the Americans for Democratic Action, the Cooperative League of the United States of America, the International League for Peace and Freedom, and the Committee for Economic Stability, as well as the principal sponsors. A representative from the American Smelting and Refining Co. favored the exclusion of minerals from the proposal, a suggestion which the committee adopted. Alone in total opposition to this idea were the representatives of the executive branch. The sum of their arguments were that sufficient legislative authority existed to deal with surplus agricultural commodities and that some aspects of the resolutions would restrict the President too much in dealing with this problem. I shall restrain myself and quote only one sentence from the State Department's witness (Mr. Kalijarvi): "The Department does not believe the existing surplus disposal programs of the United States would be made more effective or constructive in their results by introducing an element of multilateral administration."

I have already noted that despite the administration's opposition, the committee wrote the substance of Senate Resolution 86 into the Mutual Security Act of 1956. In its report, the committee said: "The committee's action was based on a strong sentiment that more imaginative and vigorous action was necessary to find ways of using agricultural surpluses. It was not satisfied that the administration had done its utmost to explore every possible avenue of making effective use of these commodities."

The Senate agreed to the language recommended by the committee. In conference, the administration continued its opposition to the idea of attempting an international approach to the problem of surplus agricultural commodities. Among other things, it argued then that it went counter to the administration's unalterable opposition to commodity agreements. Incidentally, the administration has since, at least partially, reversed itself on this point also and has taken part in the discussions relating to coffee problems. At any rate, in conference on the 1956 Mutual Security Act, the views of the House conferees and the executive branch prevailed and the idea was lost that the United States should at least explore the possibility of dealing with food surpluses through the United Nations.

This is another and very clear example of the administration reluctance to take imaginative action until a situation has grown to crisis proportions.

I now welcome the President's belated support. I only wish that it had been forthcoming in 1956 and we could have had 4 years head start on dealing better with our surplus commodities.

THE ANTARCTIC TREATY

The Senate resumed the consideration of Executive B (86th Cong., 2d sess.), the Antarctic Treaty, signed at Washington on December 1, 1959.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, before I present my own views on the Antarctic Treaty, Mr. President, I want to take this opportunity to applaud two notable speeches delivered before this body yesterday. The first of these was an excellent summary of the main issues by my esteemed colleague on the Foreign Relations Committee, the Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD]. The second was a remarkably lucid, perceptive, and dispassionate address by the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. MCGEE]. I am frank to say that Members of this body who may still have questions about the merits of the Antarctic Treaty can do no better than to refer to the comprehensive statement made by the Senator from Wyoming, who served as a member of the U.S. delegation negotiating the treaty. I congratulate him on a very fine performance, and I would add that we are commencing to expect such performances from him as a normal occurrence.

Mr. President, I rise to explain and support Executive B, 86th Congress, 2d session, the Antarctic Treaty. This treaty, which was signed at Washington on December 1, 1959, and sent to the Senate on February 15, 1960, developed from an initiative launched by the United States in May of 1958. The treaty signatories are the United States, the U.S.S.R., all seven nations which have made official territorial claims to Antarctica, and three other countries which have been actively interested in the continent. These 12 nations are those which took part in the Antarctic program of the International Geophysical Year of 1957–58.

The overall purposes of the treaty may be summarized as follows: First, the treaty is designed to assure complete and cooperative access to Antarctica's scientific information, which has been described as the continent's single important export for many years to come.

Secondly, Antarctica is to be used exclusively for peaceful purposes: measures of a military nature, as well as nuclear explosions and disposal of radioactive waste, will be banned in the treaty area, that is, all territory below 60° South latitude. At the same time, this prohibition does not preclude the use of military personnel or equipment there in connection with scientific research, nor the use of atomic powerplants for heat and light.

In the third place, the complex and sensitive problem of territorial claims is to be stabilized through an agreement that the status quo will be preserved indefinitely without prejudice to any nation's claims, rights, or bases of claims—whether asserted or latent. In this regard, neither the United States nor the U.S.S.R. has made any territorial claims, nor do they recognize the claims of any other nation. This provision is intended to guard against the possibility of territorial disputes which could lead to the verge of armed conflict, as has happened in the past because of the overlapping national claims of three of our friends.

Finally, to insure the fulfillment of these objectives, there is provision for complete unilateral inspection rights, including that of aerial overflight, which is the basis of President Eisenhower's open skies proposal. Linked with this proviso are arrangements for continuous full exchanges of information about expeditions, base stations, and military personnel and equipment by the treaty members.

The treaty will be open for accession by any member of the United Nations; any other country could only accede with the consent of all the original 12 signatories and those additional nations which meanwhile also might have become consultative parties by conducting substantial scientific activity in Antarctica. The so-called consultative parties, as distinct from other contracting parties, would be charged with recommending measures in furtherance of the treaty through meetings at suitable intervals and places. However, it should be stressed that all rights established in the treaty may be exercised from the date of its entry into force.

The duration of the treaty is open-ended, that is, of indefinite duration; for a period of 30 years after its entry into force, it may only be modified or amended by unanimous consent of the consultative parties.

Two further points, dealing with enforcement, should be mentioned in this summary description of the treaty. One is that the contracting parties will take all measures consistent with the U.N. charter to insure that no one engages in activities in Antarctica contrary to the terms of the treaty. The other is that any disputes between two or more contracting parties would be resolved by means of their own choice, including optional use of the International Court of Justice. Thus, the treaty does not involve the question of compulsory jurisdiction by the court. Parenthetically, I might add that it also does not deal with the problems of international law regarding the high seas and territorial limits.

Mr. President, I shall not go into further detail at this time in explaining the articles of the Antarctic Treaty. Senators have ample printed information before them in the President's message and Secretary Herter's explanation accompanying the treaty itself, the record of the hearings before the Committee on Foreign Relations, and the committee report. All of these, I believe, cover the details adequately, and unless questions are asked, I see no reason to repeat the information.

The U.S. Government in 1958 initiated the conference which led to the signing of the treaty, believing that the inability of the seven claimants to resolve their disputes, as well as the new factor of the Soviet presence in Antarctica, threatened to jeopardize the continued receipt of vital scientific data from the continent after the close of the International Geophysical Year. Careful preparatory work and skillfully conducted negotiations were the hallmarks of U.S. participation in this venture. Mr. Herman Phleger, the head of the U.S. delegation at the Antarctic Conference, did a very fine job in representing our country. There should thus be no doubt in anyone's mind regarding the fact that the executive branch strongly believes in and urges approval of its achievement.

However, lest there be such doubt, I would like to quote the following testimony given the committee by Mr. Herman Phleger, who headed the U.S. delegation at the Antarctic Conference.

> This treaty has been followed with the greatest interest by the President of the United States. The delegation had the most detailed position papers * * * agreed to by all of the Departments of Government of the United States, including the Department of Defense and Atomic Energy Commission. As each article of this treaty was negotiated, the changes and alterations proposed were communicated to all the Departments concerned and the treaty was not signed until after the consent and agreement of all the independent departments had been obtained.

Some opposition has been expressed on several grounds in regard to this treaty. As evidenced by the Foreign Relations Committee's approval of the treaty, we have not discovered much merit in the argument presented to date. However, they have been pressed with such passionate fervor that some might find them at least emotionally stirring, if not logically persuasive, unless the rebuttal of each point had been noted in the hearing record. Some consideration of these arguments therefore seems inescapable.

First, it is stated that the treaty invites the Soviet Union into Antarctica and gives it rights there which it does not now possess. The only trouble with this argument is that it does not happen to be true. As a result of its participation in the IGY, the Soviet Union since 1956 has maintained bases in Antarctica and shows no intention of abandoning the continent. The treaty merely recognizes the existence of reality on this score.

We have heard it intimated that the Soviets are not really interested in scientific research in Antarctica and therefore must have subversive intentions. It is a little difficult to understand why a nation with the scientific capability to launch the Lunik should not be genuinely interested in Antarctica's scientific potential. And there is just no evidence that the Soviet Union has undertaken any but legitimate scientific and exploratory activities in the continent over the past 4 years.

What are the rights that the treaty supposedly gives to the Soviet Union? Article IV states fully and explicitly that no contracting party shall obtain or relinquish any territorial rights because of the treaty and for the duration of the treaty. In fact, under this document, the Soviet Union and the other contracting parties largely incur obligations and restrictions upon their freedom to do as they might wish. In the absence of a treaty, there is nothing—short of the use of force—to prevent the U.S.S.R. behaving as it pleases in Antarctica. I have not heard even the most ardent opponents of the treaty suggest that a resort to force would be either desirable, feasible, or productive of the intended results.

It is argued that participation in the treaty gives international recognition and legitimacy to the Soviet presence in Antarctica. Beyond the fact that it is explicitly stated that the question of rights and claims is "frozen," it should be noted that adherence to the treaty is open to all U.N. members. In addition, if one argues that international sanction is important to the U.S.S.R., one is also arguing against the view that the Soviet Union will scorn world opinion by breaking the treaty at will. The basic question here is whether the Soviet presence would become any less real or less potentially expansive and dangerous over a period of time in the absence of a treaty. The obvious answer seems to be "No."

The second main argument is centered on the question of our reserved right to make an official territorial claim in Antarctica. This right has been carefully and stringently protected over more than two decades even though we have not exercised it. It will continue unchanged under the terms of the Antarctic Treaty despite the charges of those who profess to believe that language, no matter how conclusive in form, will not protect our rights. The difficulty with this latter line of reasoning is that it leads progressively to the conclusions that international law is totally nonexistent, that treaties are worthless scraps of paper, that nations cannot make lasting agreements with each other, and that only the law of the jungle is applicable to the community of nations. I believe most Americans would vehemently reject such conclusions. I certainly reject them.

The primary argument on the claims question seems to be that the United States should reject the treaty which it initiated in favor of claiming the one portion of Antarctica not as yet officially spoken for. Unfortunately, this one-sixth of the continent between 90° and 150° west longitude is possibly its least accessible and least valuable portion. By claiming this one area we would recognize, implicitly or explicitly, the validity of the claims of others which rested on the same bases of discovery and exploration. Also, we would place in jeopardy our reserved rights of free access to all Antarctica. Finally, this course of action probably would stimulate the Soviet Union, and perhaps others, to make similar moves. No one has yet made it clear just what advantage would be gained from such a step, especially since there seems to be a tacit agreement among the seven actual claimants that the United States has the best title to that particular slice of the Antarctic pie.

A secondary argument on the claims problem takes the form of a plea for delaying the consideration of the treaty while the United States invites the other official claimants to a conference at which they and we would present and discuss complete lists of all the claims ever made. In the first place, the United States has tried and failed to get the seven claimants to agree among themselves, much less with us, on the basis of an entirely new presentation. Second, those countries would scarcely welcome an attempt to reduce in our favor the areas to which they believe their titles are perfectly sound. In the third place, just the question of what constitutes a valid claim could give rise to a discussion covering a period of years—which may be what the advocates of this proposal contemplate. Finally, in the wholly unlikely event that the many intricate claims problems could ever be solved in this manner, the solution would be rejected by the U.S.S.R., which presumably would still be in the area and free of restraints.

In the last analysis, since we cannot waste time regretting what might have been, the way in which the treaty deals with the claims question is the only feasible alternative, and one which is in this Nation's best interests.

These arguments about claims seem to rest on certain assumptions about the value of proclaiming national sovereignty over a portion of Antarctica. But it is difficult to obtain clear statements on this score. Since the treaty is primarily designed to bring the positive benefits of maintaining full access to the continent for scientific purposes and of precluding disputes and armed conflicts, presumably these benefits are not the values at stake. As for the potential economic worth of Antarctica, the committee hearing record makes it clear that this at best is purely a matter for speculation. In any case, the treaty has no direct bearing on this question.

The case for the value of a territorial claim at this time surely does not rest on military advantages. For, in the absence of a treaty, the U.S.S.R. as matters stand today could make just as much use of such advantages. If we could launch missiles, so could the Soviets. If we could create submarine bases, so could the Soviets.

There are other, even less weighty, arguments being made in opposition to the treaty. I think some of them derive from an inability to retain perspective concerning the physical character of Antarctica. That continent, the most desolate place on earth, is covered with an ice cap having an average thickness of over 1 mile and a maximum known depth of 14,000 feet. So great is the weight of ice that the land apparently has been forced below sea level in many places. On the surface of this frozen continent winds can blow with 200 miles an hour force, and the average winter temperature at the geographic South Pole is below minus 70° Fahrenheit. Surrounding Antarctica are the stormiest seas in the world. Only highly experienced and well-equipped expeditions can succeed in efforts to pry loose from this land the scientific information which is its most valuable commodity.

No one claims that the Antarctic Treaty is a perfect document that will automatically cover every small contingency to be conceived by the fertile brain of man. If 12 countries are to join in any agreement, there has to be some flexibility on the part of each. The demand for perfection is conducive to paralysis, not to peace.

Mr. President, I believe that the Antarctic Treaty is a sound approach to noble objectives, which could have profound implications for the search for peace in the space age. If, for any reason, the treaty should prove unworkable in the future, the status of Antarctica would revert to the conditions which now prevail. The United States does not relinquish any of its rights under the treaty; this country and the entire free world have almost nothing to lose and much to gain from this undertaking. As one of my colleagues on the other side of the aisle remarked, if we cannot reach an agreement with the Soviet Union in this instance where our basic interests seem to coincide, then there is virtually no hope for an agreement on any of the complex problems which divide us now and increasingly will confront us in the future.

I urge the Senate to approve the treaty.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. I wish to ask a clarifying question. Is it not true that at present there is no conflict of territorial claims between the United States and Russia in Antarctica?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. That is quite correct. Both countries have followed the policy of not asserting any sovereign claims in Antarctica. In this respect, their interests are identical. So there is no conflict at the present time.

Mr. AIKEN. With the adoption of this treaty by all interested countries, is it not correct that there is no possibility of a conflict in the future between the United States and Russia over territorial claims?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I should not think there would be such a conflict. There are seven countries which have asserted territorial claims, not including the United States and Russia, which have not done so. So I see no possibility of any conflict over territorial claims.

Mr. AIKEN. I believe the Senator is correct. The third question, and I think the important one, is this: If we fail to approve this treaty, then is not the way open for a conflict over territorial claims in the future, which might lead to an armed conflict or to the necessity for establishing armed outposts in that area, which we all know would be extremely costly and probably ineffective?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I think the Senator from Vermont is quite correct. As a matter of fact, there has already been a minor armed conflict in that region between the United Kingdom and Argentina over their respective claims. So this possibility is brewing already. I am confident that if we abandon the policy which we have had, and which the treaty follows, and start to assert sovereignty, certainly the Soviet Union would rush in and say she has rights. Then there would be a general free-for-all.

Mr. AIKEN. The failure to approve the treaty would almost certainly result in altercations in the future, would it not?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I should think so; yes.

Mr. AIKEN. I thank the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I wish to say that I have heard rumors to the effect that considerable opposition to the treaty—more than I had anticipated—has developed. But I deeply regret that during the discussion of the treaty today, I find in the Chamber only 8 or 10 Senators, who seemingly are in favor of the treaty, or at least understand it. But the Members of the Senate who oppose the treaty are, apparently, not interested in discussing it.

I think the treaty sets a pattern which may be of extreme importance. I refer particularly to the provision in regard to inspection. I shall not now refer to all the provisions of the treaty, because this matter was covered fairly well yesterday. But the provision in regard to inspection could constitute a most important precedent for the future, if the treaty is ratified and if its provisions are carried out in good faith, as I expect them to be. Under those circumstances, the countries would become accustomed to having their scientific installations and their ships inspected by other countries, and they would find that this provision, which is only a first step in the direction of international agreement, is helpful, not harmful.

I do not wish to overemphasize the importance of this matter, because we are dealing with an area which is covered by ice and snow; as the experts have said, it is important only for scientific exploration. Nevertheless, it is the only area in the world to which these principles in regard to inspection could be applied at this time, in view of the present turbulent state of the world.

So I believe it would be a great mistake if this treaty—which our country itself initiated, and which is in accord with the principles of the so-called Hughes doctrine, initiated back in 1924—were not ratified. I believe it would be a great tragedy if, in our casual procedure and our preoccupation with the election and other things, this treaty were permitted to fail. I believe that would be an act of the gravest irresponsibility. Certainly it would be an act of irresponsibility, because obviously many Members of the Senate are not present in the Chamber to discuss and to understand the various provisions of the treaty.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. CARLSON. I wish to commend the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee for the very excellent statement he has made and for his analysis of some of the problems which have arisen in connection with the treaty.

I emphasize his statement that the treaty was originated by the United States. For the record, I wish to quote, from the hearings, what Mr. Phleger said on this point:

> In conclusion, I point out that this treaty was conceived by the United States, the conference which drafted it was called at the instance of the United States, and the treaty contains all the provisions which the United States believed were required for the protection of its national interest. It is also a significant step forward in the field of international cooperation for peaceful purposes.

When we are dealing with this matter, I believe it is important for us to realize that our country did originate the treaty, and did conceive it, and has carried it through.

As I understand, all the points about which we were concerned are included in the treaty.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. That is quite correct. Nothing was forced on us against our will. Generally speaking, the treaty, which we initiated, has been the subject of exceptional cooperation by all the nations which have signed it.

As I have said, Mr. Phleger—whom I knew long before he was in the Government service—is one of the ablest lawyers in the United States. I believe he did an outstanding job in negotiating the treaty. Certainly he did an outstanding job as a witness. He knew what he was talking about. I do not see how anyone can question the logic or consistency or power of his arguments. I have the greatest confidence in him, because of my long knowledge of his abilities.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield further?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. CARLSON. I wish to state that I share the views of the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee about the abilities of Mr. Phleger. It was my privilege to serve as one of the observers for the U.S. Senate in connection with the writing of the treaty. I served in that capacity together with the distinguished Senator from Wyoming [Mr. McGEE]. We were advised daily of the progress being made; and I believe we were most fortunate as regards the team which represented our country in connection with the preparation of the treaty.

Later, I expect to speak briefly in support of the treaty; but at this time I wish the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee to know that I believe he has done an excellent job in presenting the treaty to the Senate.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I thank the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. President, just one other comment, and I shall be through: Prior to the hearing, there were whispers to the effect that certain members of the Armed Forces, particularly of the Navy, do not favor the treaty. In that connection, we made inquiry, individually, and we had Rear Admiral Tyree before the committee. I specifically asked him, "Is it true that the Navy is not in favor of this treaty?"

He replied, "No. We think it is in the national interest."

Rear Admiral Tyree is a naval officer, of course; and he was at the hearing to speak for the Department of Defense. He was not equivocal in any respect in his statements about the attitude of the Defense Department. However, I understand that it is still being bruited about that the Navy was whipped into line by the President or by the Secretary of State. But I do not think such unfounded rumors are worthy of our consideration. We cannot possibly allow our judgment to be influenced by such rumors in regard to the position of unofficial persons who are not available as witnesses.

It may be true that all naval officers have visions of having a naval base on every possible promontory all over the world; perhaps they think it would be nice to have many bases where officers' clubs could be located. But certainly it is very dangerous for us to be influenced by unfounded rumors to the effect that some naval officers do not favor the treaty.

In the committee we did everything we could do to obtain the full story, insofar as the position of the administration is concerned; and it is set forth in the hearings.

Rear Admiral Tyree did not testify with reservations. He testified that he is for the treaty, in the national interest, from the national security point of view. Of course, it is not for him to say whether the treaty is politically wise.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. BUSH. I have received from residents of my State a number of communications about the treaty. I am delighted with the presentation the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee has made in the Senate today. I believe he has made an excellent case for the treaty. In my opinion, he has completely covered the subject; and he has eliminated from my mind any doubt whatever as to whether the treaty should be approved.

I was interested in his comment about Herman Phleger, who initiated the treaty. It should be pointed out for the record that Herman Phleger is not a newcomer to the Government service. He served for 4 years in the State Department during the time when John Foster Dulles was Secretary of State. Thereafter, Mr. Phleger returned to his home in San Francisco, where he resumed the private practice of law. So able a man is he, and so much did he impress both the President and the State Department, that Mr. Phleger was summoned to do this particular job.

So, as the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee has pointed out, the treaty has been in excellent hands. Because of my great respect for Herman Phleger, I wish to add this word in regard to the important service he has rendered the country.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I thank the Senator from Connecticut. I have known Mr. Phleger since 1934 or 1935. I knew him when he was in private practice, and I know he is a very outstanding member of the bar. In addition, he has performed most important Government service.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I rise in opposition to ratification of the Antarctic Treaty.

The inadvisability of this treaty has already been pointed out and discussed in some detail. The United States has broader and more solid foundations for the basis of claims to sovereignty in Antarctica than has any other nation. For some unknown reason, these claims have never been asserted by our Government. It is now proposed that we commit ourselves for a period of 30 years not to advance these claims in exchange for similar commitments from other nations, many of whom, particularly the Russians, have no basis for claims in Antarctica in the first place.

We, of all people, have access to the most detailed information on this area at the bottom of the world. In the light of this information, it cannot be denied that this area has great potential economic and military value to the people of the United States. This treaty would, in effect, surrender a valuable possession which belongs to all of our people; and from a study of the history of the explorations and various bases of claims in Antarctica, it is obvious that we would receive little, if any, consideration for our surrender of rights.

Mr. President, there are many aspects of this proposed treaty which weigh against its ratification by this body. One of the most important of these aspects is the composition of the parties to the treaty. There are 12 signatories to this proposed treaty. Of the 12, 7 have made claims of sovereignty in Antarctica. These are Great Britain, France, Australia, Norway, Argentina, Chile, and New Zealand. It can be clearly understood why these nations would necessarily have to be parties to any treaty which encompassed the entirety of the Antarctic Continent. Many of their claims overlap. This leaves five nations among the signatories who have made no claims in Antarctica. The remaining five who are signatories of the proposed treaty are the United States, Belgium, Japan, Union of South Africa, and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. The United States issued invitations to the 11 other participating countries on the basis that these nations participated in the antarctic program of the International Geophysical Year. This is indeed a strange and illogical way to determine the participants in such a treaty. Japan, for instance, renounced all of her claims for sovereignty in Antarctica at the end of World War II.

The key to the composition of the signatories lies, in my opinion, in the inclusion of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. Prior to the International Geophysical Year, the Soviet Union had no basis for any claim to sovereignty on the Antarctic Continent itself. This should be very obvious from the fact that Russia has made no formal claim, despite the fact that its Government is the most aggressively expansionist of any nation of the world. On the basis of exploration and discovery—and since colonization of the Antarctic has so far proved infeasible, explorations and discovery are the only bases for claims of sovereignty—the Russians have nothing to stand on. The expedition of Bellingshausen, the only Russian expedition prior to the International Geophysical Year, had to do with some minor islands removed from the Antarctic Continent. That expedition is described in the Encyclopedia Americana as follows:

> A Russian expedition, second in importance only to that of Cook, was sent out in 1819 under the command of Fabian von Bellingshausen in the Vostok, with M. P. Lazareff in the Mirny in company, both sloops of about 500 tons. The object was to circumnavigate the antarctic area, keeping as far south as possible in those longitudes where Cook had made his northward detours. Bellingshausen crossed the Antarctic Circle in 30° W. on January 26 and by February 1 had reached 69°25′ in 1°11′ W. He then turned northward and continued to the east, getting south again as the ice permitted and reaching 69°6′ S., 18° E. Soon after the sloops were forced north by a succession of heavy gales but continued eastward south of 65° S. and crossed the circle once more in 41° E. A violent storm drove the ships northward, but they still held to the east south of 60° S. as far as 87° E. Bellingshausen next visited Sydney, Australia; leaving early in November, he reached the 60th parallel a month later in longitude 143° W., and sailing eastward kept south of that parallel through 145° of longitude during 65 days, keeping close along the pack edge south of New Zealand. He crossed the circle three more times, in 164°30′ W. in 120° W., and in 92°10′ W., where he reached 69°52′ S. On January 22, 1821, Bellingshausen sighted the first land ever seen within the circle, the little island named for Peter I.
> A week later another and larger island, named for Alexander I, was seen. Bellingshausen then made for the south Shetlands and thence returned to Russia.

Obviously, this gives the Russians no basis for claims in Antartica.

The question naturally arises as to why the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics was invited as a party to a proposed treaty for Antarctica. A careful study of the surrounding circumstances seems to indicate that our State Department was confronted with a difficult situation and is seeking the easy way out. Russia, during the International Geophysical Year, established some operations on the Antarctic Continent that still remain. We decline the straightforward approach which would be to formally assert our own claims of sovereignty, and then seek to work out with the other seven claiming nations the disputes over sovereignty in Antarctica to the exclusion of the Communist bloc. Instead, this treaty was apparently devised to postpone any realistic approach to the questions which had arisen on the Antarctic Continent, including that created by continuation of Russian activities there since the end of the International Geophysical Year.

Unquestionably, continuing and increasing Russian activities on the Antarctic Continent in territories to which sovereignty is claimed by free world countries could be embarrassing to the United States were we unwilling to stand in a position of leadership for the settlement of the territorial disputes between the free world nations, and then to defend those territories against any encroachment by members of the Communist bloc.

We have assumed—nominally, at least—the position of leadership of the free world against Communist aggression. In exercising this leadership we have correctly and accurately blamed our reversals on the bad faith and completely selfish attitude of the Communist leaders. The questions of sovereignty in the Antarctic, at least prior to the International Geophysical Year, did not in any way concern the Communist nations, however, and our leadership was notably lacking in settling the conflicting territorial claims among our own allies. Our attitude could best be described as "timid." The claims of the United States on the Antarctic Continent, whether measured by discovery, extent of exploration, or continuous effort, are at least equal, if not superior, to any claims asserted by any nation in Antarctica. Administration after administration has shirked the assertion of these claims. There is no sound and logical explanation for our failure to claim what is rightfully ours from either the standpoint of reason or of international law. I suspect that the prime motive for our dilatory attitude has been a false sense of pride; for, particularly in recent years, we have shown a great reluctance to subject ourselves to criticism for "imperialistic ambitions," regardless of the source of criticism or its lack of justification. We have bent over backward too long to appreciate the value of an upright position.

If there is one outstanding weakness of the foreign policy of the United States in recent years, it is our reluctance to officially demand and defend our rights and sovereignty from any and all encroachments, from whatever source they originate. We cannot prevent war or even disputes by an attitude which is not simply conciliatory, but is tainted with lack of resolution and which gives the appearance of weakness. Is it not reasonable to assume that if we continue to seek the easy way out and to relinquish rightful claims in the interest of harmony, our allies will rightly conclude that if we are unwilling to stanchly defend against all comers our own rights and prerogatives, we are most unlikely to vigorously oppose an encroachment on their national interest? I do not by any means advocate a course of belligerency, but it is time we as a nation understood that our overzealous efforts to avoid belligerency can be interpreted by our allies as weakness and even appeasement. We first gained stature as an independent and mature nation when we defended our right to use the high seas unmolested; and under the slogan, "Millions for defense, but not 1 cent for tribute," we boldly undertook the destruction of the Barbary pirates, a task from which stronger, but more timid, nations had shrunk. Surely we cannot maintain the respect of the international community unless they recognize in our policies and actions a moral resolve which is not tainted with appeasement.

Had we as a nation shown the fortitude to assert our rightful claims to sovereignty in the Antarctic as they arose, I seriously doubt whether all of the disputes on territorial claims among free world nations would now exist.

From even a superficial study of the claims in the Antarctic, it is obvious the nations of the world recognize that the United States does have the basis for claims in Antarctica. This is evident by the fact that the territory remaining unclaimed is that in which the United States has almost exclusive priority of right to claim. In effect, there is a de facto recognition of U.S. sovereignty in parts of Antarctica, despite the fact that we as a nation have never seen fit to officially claim and pronounce the sovereignty. Is there any wonder, in view of this head-in-the-sand approach, that we have been completely unsuccessful in supplying the leadership to settle the disputes of territorial claims among our friends and allies? We have, indeed, done the other claiming nations an injustice and disservice by our unrealistic attitude. There is actually little incentive for other claiming nations to attempt to settle among themselves their territorial disputes so long as we leave them in the dark as to the extent of the territory to which we believe ourselves entitled to sovereignty by virtue of our efforts in the Antarctic. Even were the seven claiming nations to settle the boundaries among themselves, what assurance have they—knowing, as they do, the preeminence of the bases for claims available to the United States—that the United States will not immediately thereafter take advantage of any relinquishment one or more might have made and claim extensive territories to their disadvantage? It would appear quite obvious that no realistic and complete settlement of the territorial claims in Antarctica can be concluded until each and every nation with the basis for such claims defines precisely and asserts the extent of the claims to which the nations believe themselves entitled. Once such claims are known to all, it is quite possible that a settlement could be reached, either through multilateral negotiations or arbitration.

It is paradoxic, but obvious, that because of our timidity, we have not only failed to provide the leadership for the settlement of territorial claims in Antactica to the exclusion of Communist countries—which in fact that no basis for such claims—but, indeed, by our failure to define and assert our rightful claims, we have effectually prevented any such settlement. It is still possible, even at this late date, for the United States to rectify the situation by pursuing the only straightforward course that is open to us. We should immediately assert our sovereignty to such areas of Antarctica as our discoveries and explorations entitle us. At the same time, we should invite those nations which have claims, or the bases for claims, of sovereignty on the Antarctic Continent to negotiate a settlement of the dispute as to territorial boundaries. Undoubtedly, if we made a realistic appraisal of the bases for claims for U.S. sovereignty, those claims would conflict with others now existing. It is also likely that in some, and perhaps many, instances, if such claims were impartially adjudicated, our claim would prevail; and enlightened self-interest might then well dictate that we relinquish portions to which we were rightfully entitled in the interest of a final settlement on the entire continent. This would constitute leadership—in contrast to our past and present policies toward Antarctica.

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THURMOND. I am pleased to yield to the distinguished and able Senator from California.

Mr. ENGLE. What the Senator is saying is that there is an alternative to ratification of the treaty. The alternative is an assertion of rights, with an adjustment among the various claimants as to their proper claims in the Antarctic. In other words, we are not faced with the simple proposition of whether we ought to ratify the treaty. We should examine the other alternative which is available.

As I understand the distinguished Senator, he says that one of the alternatives which is available is the assertion of American claims, the adjustment of those claims where they conflict with other nations, and then perhaps some broader settlement with reference to the entire continent of Antarctica, and that that action would constitute not only a protection of American rights which have been established by exploration, discovery, and occupation in the Antarctic, but, in addition, would lay the basis for some kind of firm agreement in the Antarctic itself and for the disposition of the problems of the whole continent.

I compliment the Senator for calling attention to the fact that we do not have to take this treaty. We ought to examine the other alternatives, and one of the other alternatives is trying to have our claims established and settled. Once we do that, as to the 20 percent area which is unclaimed at the present time, perhaps we can get some settlement of that also by a give-and-take arrangement of some kind or other.

Mr. THURMOND. The Senator is precisely correct, and his keen insight in this subject and broad knowledge of it has enabled him to put his finger right on the point.

It should be clearly understood that although the proposed treaty has been signed, it is not a binding document, and our country will in no way be bound by its terms until Senate ratification is accomplished. There is no moral or other obligation of the Senate to give its stamp of approval to Executive proposals for compacts with foreign countries.

By virtue of clause 2, section 2 of article II of the Constitution, the Senate of the United States is an integral part of the treatymaking process. Indeed, in the Constitutional Convention of 1787, in Philadelphia, a committee's report would have given the Senate the full power to make treaties. It was probably as a compromise that the Executive was made a part of the treatymaking process.

In earlier years, the Senate, in the exercise of its advice and consent powers, participated to a very extensive degree in the treatymaking process. For instance, in 1846, during the controversy with Great Britain over the northwest border of the United States, President Polk upon receipt of a proposal by Great Britain, submitted it to the Senate for its advice prior to answering the proposal.

In contemporaneous practice, the Senate has to a major extent apparently become a rubber stamp for previously conceived, approved, or agreed to treaties by the executive branch. Some of the treaties submitted to the Senate for ratification are so worded as to demonstrate an attitude on the part of the State Department's personnel of complete disdain for the Senate's part in the treatymaking process. Even in the Senate itself, I perceive the existence of a disinclination to interfere in or upset the decision of our Executive in foreign policy determinations, which obviously are reached by the entrenched foreign-minded personnel of the State Department. It almost seems that there prevails a feeling that the Senate will be letting our Government down if it fails to ratify whatever actions, however ill advised, that are taken by the Executive with regard to treaties.

The Senate should be made aware, as was Great Britain with regard to the Alabama claims in 1869, that the rejection of a treaty by the Senate "can be the subject of no complaint and can give no occasions for dissatisfaction or criticism"; or in the words of Secretary of State Madison, spoken in 1804 to the Government of Spain, in referring to the rejection by the Senate of a proposed treaty with that government "when peculiarities of this sort in the structure of a government are sufficiently known to other governments, they have no right to take exception in the inevitable effect of it."

What we made known to other nations of the world in the earlier days of our Republic we need to follow ourselves now. There is, and can be, no treaty by the U.S. Government unless and until the Senate of the United States gives its advice and consent thereto; and until such advice and consent is given, there is no obligation of any kind or nature whatsoever on the Government of the United States by virtue of treaty negotiations which precede such advice and consent.

In pondering the events which led to the signing of this proposed treaty, there recurs in my mind a sense of astonishment that some of these nations—excluding Russia, of course—concurred in this proposal even reluctantly—and I cannot escape the conclusion that their acquiescence was reluctant. Several of the signatories long ago asserted claims to sovereignty in well-defined areas, and over the years have assiduously persisted in those claims. Although this proposed treaty does not profess to nullify such claims of sovereignty, it does profess to suspend such claims for what can only be presumed to be an indefinite period, which, in reality, amounts to the same thing. The terms of the proposed treaty, therefore, are contrary to all previous actions of the signatories with regard to the territories they claim in Antarctica. What is responsible for this apparent reversal of attitude? In this instance, we must accept responsibility; but the term "leadership" would be of most dubious application. I have previously mentioned that we have in no small way contributed to the continued unsettled state of the claims of sovereignty by our friends in Antarctica by virtue of our neglect to officially appraise them of the extent of our own claims. We can only conclude that the preeminence of our own rights in Antarctica was no small factor in instigating their acquiescence in the terms of this proposed treaty. With our assumption of leadership of the free world, we have allowed, if not encouraged, our allies to accept dependency on the military strength of the United States in the free world's controversy with communism. In dealing with the Communists, in Antarctica as elsewhere, free nations certainly cannot ignore their reliance on the military strength of the United States as a cornerstone in any effort to achieve a resolution of a conflict with Russia in Antarctica as elsewhere. There is no evidence that we offered assurances to our allies that we would defend their claims of sovereignty, which we have not recognized, any more than we would defend our own, which we have not even asserted. In view of these circumstances, it would appear that the other free nations which are signatories of this proposed treaty had little choice of any other alternative than acquiescence in our proposal. Were the position of us and one of the other free nations reversed, would we not be justified in saying: "If this be leadership, let us have no more of it"?

In urging that we should assert our own claims of sovereignty in Antarctica and then seek to settle all claims of sovereignty in Antarctica to the exclusion of Communist nations, I do not overlook the fact that the Russians are conducting certain activities in Antarctica at this moment. I am aware, however—and we as a country should act accordingly—that Russian activities in Antarctica are not conducted under any color of title or claim of right and they could be expelled, if necessary, by those having rightful claims in Antarctica, by force, if necessary. As a matter of fact, there can be little doubt that Russia, because of the geographical location of Antarctica, would have no other alternative than to peacefully accede to the demand of the western nations having a legitimate interest in Antarctica, should such demands be made. Some might fear such a direct action as provocative of a nuclear war. Such fears are illogical and groundless, for we all know, or should know at this late hour, that Russia will commence an all-out war not in response to any action by the free world, but only at such time of the Communist leaders' own choosing when they conclude that their superiority is sufficient to make the risk worthwhile. Such is the nature of Communist reasoning and actions. When the Communists are ready to commence a nuclear exchange, they will initiate their own incident in the unlikely event they decide one desirable.

Our misguided foreign policy has devised this treaty in an effort to find an easy way out. It is a continuation of our timid approach. If this treaty is ratified, the United States will have succeeded in proving the oft-quoted expression: "There's none so blind as they that won't see." Far from an easy way out, this proposed treaty, if ratified, will only multiply our difficulties. It proposes a loose, poorly defined, and uncertain joint control of Antarctica by the signatories. Already bitten once by this same animal, we now proffer the other leg.

The agreement for the administration of the city of Berlin was just such a loose and ill-defined agreement. Specifics were not covered in that document, just as they are not covered in the proposed treaty. How often have we heard lamented the oversight of not including in the four-power agreement on Berlin a written agreement, rather than an implied one, for a surface route of transit to the western zone of occupation? Should this treaty be ratified, how often in the future will we lament our failure to specify a definite procedure for the development and utilization of natural resources from the Antarctic Continent?

This proposed treaty is a completely unrealistic document. Those problems on which agreement could obviously not be reached—especially with Russia in the picture—have been left undecided. Each nation is left to place its own interpretation on this document, and it is provided that if any dispute arises, the countries involved in the dispute shall confer with a view to having the dispute resolved by some peaceful means "of their own choice." If ever there were an agreement to an invitation to disagree, article XI of the proposed treaty is that invitation. The very terms of this treaty contain more causes for potential controversy than have ever existed, or in the absence of this treaty, can reasonably be expected to exist, in Antarctica.

Each signatory, by ratification of this treaty, would commit itself to limit its activities in Antarctica to those which each shall, in its own judgment, consider peaceful. Each of the nations would, under the terms of this treaty, have the right of unilateral inspection to insure that its interpretation of the treaty was being adhered to.

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THURMOND. I am happy to yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. ENGLE. The Senator has raised a very significant point. Under the provisions of the proposed treaty, the Soviet Union could undertake such actions in Antarctica as she saw fit and interpret them as peaceful, even though they might have military significance. Is that not correct?

Mr. THURMOND. The Senator is eminently correct. The treaty provides that each signatory, by ratifying the treaty, would commit itself to limited activities in Antarctica, namely, to activities which in its own judgment it considered peaceful. If Russia considered any activity in Antarctica to be a peaceful activity, in its own judgment, Russia could pursue such activity.

Mr. ENGLE. Let us assume that Russia decided that Antarctica was a good launching place for a satellite, a satellite used for reconnaissance purposes. The Soviets would say, "This is a very kindly, peaceful satellite. It has no military applications." Of course we would know that it did have military applications, and we would then protest. We would say, "You are not entitled to do that."

The Soviets would say, "We are entitled to do it, because this action is, in fact, peaceful."

Then there would be a dispute. How do we resolve the dispute? The Senator has stated in his statement how the dispute would be resolved. I shall read the provision of the treaty:

> 1. If any dispute arises between two or more of the contracting parties concerning the interpretation or application of the present treaty, those contracting parties shall consult among themselves with a view to having the dispute resolved by negotiation, inquiry, mediation, conciliation, arbitration, judicial settlement or other peaceful means of their own choice.

So we would be sitting down with the Soviets, and we would be arguing with them, just as we were arguing with them in Korea for months, and as we are still arguing with them in Geneva, as to whether or not what they were doing down there was actually peaceful. We would say it was not. They would say it was. We would talk about it for months.

That is not all. I said yesterday:

> Each of the 12 states would have an equal voice, and measures to facilitate the carrying out of the treaty would require unanimity among them. This means that the Soviet Union could veto measures agreed upon by all the other signatories.

We are in there with several of these nations, all of whom are our friends, with the exception of the Soviet Union. Yet the Soviet Union, under the terms of the treaty, would have the power to veto the unanimous action of all the 11 other nations. They would have the power to turn down the action of the other powers, to stop it; and when they got into a dispute over it, then, under the article which I have just read, they would be entitled to sit down and argue about what peaceful means for the settlement of that dispute would be used.

So it appears that what we are doing now is creating another little Security Council. We have already had the exhibition of the Soviets in the Security Council using the veto.

We would be putting them in a place where they have not a vestige of right, where they have no claim whatever—they have not established an iota of basis for a claim in Antarctica—and we would give them the power of the veto.

We would say to them that if they want to adopt some action in Antarctica, they will decide whether or not that action is peaceful.

To go on with the very important point that the Senator is making, this is what article XII provides:

1. (a) The present treaty may be modified or amended at any time by unanimous agreement of the contracting parties whose representatives are entitled to participate in the meetings provided for under article IX.

In other words, not only will we give them the right to sit in on a program where they have no business at all; we will give them the right to determine whether their actions are peaceful actions in those areas; and if there is a dispute, to determine the method by which the dispute will be settled.

Beyond that, we say that the provisions of the treaty cannot be modified or amended except by unanimous action. That means, of course, that the Soviet Union can veto any modification or amendment, just as they can veto any action taken and agreed to unanimously by all the other 11 states for the purpose of facilitating the carrying out of the treaty according to its terms.

So the Senator from South Carolina has put his finger upon a very important point: That is, that we have invited the lion right into the kitchen again. We have him present in the Security Council. We know what he is doing. We know what he will do again if he gets the chance.

We are now asked to approve a treaty which gives the Soviet Union another veto, such as it has in the Security Council, in addition to being able to undertake and initiate actions and then pass judgment themselves, without any appeal to any source as to whether or not those actions are, in fact, peaceful actions. So this is a vital element which, in my opinion, directly affects the interest and the security of the United States, and directly affects the power of the Western allies to oppose communism.

Mr. THURMOND. The distinguished Senator from California is quite correct. We know that if the Soviet Union saw fit at any time to veto any item from her own standpoint, she would do so. We know, further, from past experience, that the Soviet Union would not hesitate to violate a treaty, a contract, or an agreement. So what do we gain by having Soviet Russia enter into a treaty with us on this matter at all?

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina further yield?

Mr. THURMOND. I am pleased to yield.

Mr. ENGLE. The treaty is binding only upon the 12 signatories. It certainly would not bind any satellite of the Soviet Union. It would not be binding, for instance, upon Communist China. It would not be binding upon Hungary. It would not be binding upon Poland or any of the other Soviet satellites.

Let us assume that one of the Russian satellites goes into the Antarctic area and undertakes to establish some type of military operation. The treaty provides that the 12 signatory nations shall operate together in opposing any such intrusion. Suppose they got together and talked about it, and the Russians refused to do anything about it. Suppose Soviet Russia refused to concur? The treaty provides that actions which are taken to facilitate the terms of the treaty must be carried out by a unanimous vote. Suppose the Russians refused to do anything. Then let us suppose that we got into a dispute with them about it. We come right back to the point which the Senator from South Carolina just made; namely, that the dispute itself would then rock on interminably. It would have no terminal facilities whatever.

What would happen then? The Soviet Union would have injected into the Antarctic a satellite nation for the purpose of establishing a military base of one kind or another. The Soviet Union, being a party to the treaty, could block any action which might be taken by the 12 signatories to eject that satellite. The United States of America could do nothing about it; its own hands would be tied.

We could not establish a military base in the Antarctic to counterbalance the military base established by the nonsignatory satellite of the Soviet Union, because as a party to the treaty we have agreed to demilitarize the area. So we would have handcuffed ourselves.

Furthermore, we are subject to inspection. The Russians could run their inspection teams around to make certain that we were not doing anything of a military nature in that area, either passively or aggressively.

So we would have tied our hands so that we could not possibly meet the Soviet military action being taken through its satellite. They could proceed to set up their missile installations.

I assert that the treaty is simply bulging and bristling with all sorts of threats to the security of the United States of America.

Mr. THURMOND. The Senator from California is quite correct. I may say that if one did not know that our country had had a part in preparing the treaty, he would wonder whether or not it was prepared by an enemy of the United States.

Mr. President, each of the nations would, under the terms of the treaty have the right of unilateral inspection to insure that its interpretation of the treaty was being adhered to.

Differences being assured by virtue of the certain interpretation by each country to its own advantage, what recourse is provided through unilateral inspection? Indeed, there is no recourse at all, and not only an invitation to controversy, but an insurance of conflict. Consider the reaction if Russia attempted to transport a launching site for a spy satellite to the Antractic, where its launching and monitoring would be most feasible. Would the Communists be so cooperative as to agree that such action was other than peaceful, and can we truly conceive that an attempt by Americans to inspect the transporting ship would be met by other than force and violence if persistent? Surely we now have the bases for sufficient international controversies with communism to tax our best efforts without adding more of our own making.

The very fact that the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics has so willingly participated in the negotiations leading to the signing of this proposed treaty, and thereafter affixed its signature to the document, should serve as a red flag of warning to any who appreciate the nature of the Communist ideology. The history of the Russian nation under communism is consistent and flawless proof that the Russians enter into international agreements when, and only when, such agreements further their own interest or what they consider to be their own interest. We should keep in mind that the goal they seek to advance, and to which is directed both their domestic and foreign policies, is the communization of the world. This treaty furthers the interest of communism since it gives to the Russian Communists a foothold in Antarctica which they have been unable to secure by other means. It would be bad enough if we could anticipate that the Russians would do no worse than fail to abide by the treaty's terms, but their methods are much more devious than this. International agreements are considered by the Communist dogma as shields of deceit and tools of aggression. By proposing this Antarctic Treaty, we would supply the Communists with a wedge to breach the good relations between us and other free world countries which have valid interests in Antarctica. By this treaty we would bind ourselves to a set of rules which our consciences and national pride would require us to honor; while the Communists, in adherence to their policy of utter bad faith, would not only not live by, but would twist and distort deliberately and with malice to our own disadvantage. One can reach no other conclusion in arriving at a prognosis of Russian actions under this proposed treaty, if he considers it in light of their past actions, which, incidentally, are well documented in the 1959 report of the Internal Security Subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee on "Soviet Political Agreements and Results."

Even were not the Russians a party to the proposed treaty, the treaty would nevertheless be an unsound and fallacious approach to a resolution of the problems concerning the future administration of the Antarctic Continent. Under the provisions of the treaty all United Nations members who are willing to participate in scientific endeavors in the Antarctic are invited to become parties to the treaty. Each nation which would become a party to the treaty would have a say-so and, in fact, would be authorized and guided by its own interpretation of the treaty's terms in the administration of this subpolar region. Under such circumstances lofty ideals such as those enunciated in this proposed document are but invitations to disaster, for in this era predominated by the resurgence of nationalistic tendencies every nation, and particularly those which only recently joined the community of nations, exhibits a strong and determined fetish with regard to their individual national interests. These circumstances insure differences of opinion even when the parties are dealing in good faith. The creation of such circumstances, fostering, as they do, causes for differences and disunities, does disservice to the best interest of the community of nations.

The question of ratification of this proposed treaty can well determine the future course of our country's foreign policy. Ratification of the treaty would serve as an endorsement of our postwar policies of drift and procrastination. Now is the time to change from a foreign policy of reaction to a policy of action. By a rejection of the proposed treaty, the Senate of the United States has the opportunity to reaffirm the hope of the free-world nations that the United States is now prepared to wear its mantle of leadership with responsibility, rather than evasiveness and vacillation.

The Senate of the United States has an obligation to the entire country to protect the rights of the American people in the treatymaking process to the same or to a greater extent than it does in the lawmaking process. To advise and consent to an obviously unwise treaty, which is in derogation of the property rights and sovereignty of the people of the United States, would be a neglect of duty to uphold the Constitution of the United States, which each of us has sworn to observe. The Union of Soviet Socialist Republics greedily anticipates our favorable action on this question. That Government realizes, as do the other parties to the proposed treaty, that the Senate of the United States is a part of the treatymaking process of the U.S. Government. They will have no cause for complaint at the loss of a windfall, should we reject this proposed treaty, although it unquestionably, to Russia at least, will be great cause for disappointment. I urge the Senate to exercise its constitutional duty in the manner intended by the framers of the Constitution, and renounce its role as a rubberstamp for our timid State Department. Let us take this opportunity to protect the rights and sovereignty of the people of the United States, and replace the greedy anticipation of the Communists with disappointment at their loss, and disillusionment that the Senate of the United States is no longer a tool of a weak U.S. Department of State.

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CARLSON in the chair). Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. THURMOND. I am pleased to yield to the distinguished Senator from California.

Mr. ENGLE. Again I should like to compliment my colleague upon his very fine speech.

Earlier in his presentation he put his finger upon one of the key issues; namely, why the Soviets are in this picture at all. From the Senator's investigation of this matter, has he been able to find any basis for Soviet claims in Antarctica?

Mr. THURMOND. As stated in the earlier part of my address, I have not been able to find any basis on the part of Russia for a claim to Antarctica; and I quoted from the Encyclopedia Americana to substantiate that position.

Mr. ENGLE. A Russian admiral named Bellingshausen toured that area many, many years ago. But he did not sight the Antarctic continent; and in no statement that he made did he ever claim that he had sighted the Antarctic, or made any claim to it, or claimed that it existed as a separate continent.

As I understand, the Soviets have been active in that area mainly since the beginning of the International Geophysical Year, in which we invited them to participate. But whatever claim the Soviets have on that basis is very flimsy and immature, and certainly does not rank with the claims of the United States and other nations that have been in that area a great many years.

So is it correct to say that there is no substantial basis whatsoever for Soviet claims to the Antarctic; and that, therefore, to let the Soviets into the Antarctic would be a pure gratuity on the part of the United States and the other countries which do have legitimate claims in that area?

Mr. THURMOND. The Senator from California is absolutely and unequivocally correct. The expedition of Bellingshausen, the only Russian expedition prior to the International Geophysical Year, had to do with some minor islands removed from the Antarctic Continent.

Mr. ENGLE. Perhaps the Senator from South Carolina can clarify another point. It has been said that 20 percent of the Antarctic Continent is not claimed by any country. So what right do these 12 nations have to arrogate to themselves, in this treaty, as they undertake to do, the disposition, control, and administration of the Antarctic Continent?

Mr. THURMOND. I believe they do not have any authority to try to take over the areas of the Antarctic Continent where claims have not been staked out by any nations. It is my opinion that the United States has done more than any other nation to stake out claims there, and that the United States would be entitled to stake out its claims, but would not have authority to dispose of portions that have not been claimed or staked out by any nation, not even by the United States.

Mr. ENGLE. But 20 percent of the area is not claimed by any nation. However, these 12 nations—including, gratuitously, as I have said, the Soviet Union—undertake to sit around a table and to arrogate to themselves, by means of this treaty, the right to exclude any other nation from that area. Can the Senator from South Carolina think of any moral basis for the 12 nations signatory to the treaty to proceed in that way?

Mr. THURMOND. Certainly not. Unless the American people had been assured that the treaty was prepared by the U.S. State Department, an agency of the U.S. Government, I repeat my statement, as an American—and I believe that most Americans would take the same viewpoint, if the same facts were available to them—that I believe all Americans would wonder whether the treaty had been prepared by an agent of Russia, in order to bring Russia into the picture, whereas in reality Russia has no right to be in it.

Mr. ENGLE. What does the distinguished Senator from South Carolina think would happen if some nation, not signatory to the treaty, came into the Antarctic and established itself in a part of that area to which no nation has up to the present time made any claim, and then went before the United Nations and said, "No nation has claimed this area, and we were not invited to participate in this treaty. We think we have a right to stake out our claims, because we have established ourselves in part of the 20 percent of the Antarctic that has not been claimed by any nation. So we call upon the United Nations to tell the 12 signatories to this treaty to mind their own business, and not attempt to crowd us out."

What does the Senator think would be the result of that kind of situation?

Mr. THURMOND. From the moral standpoint and from the standpoint of international law, there would and could be only one honest conclusion, and that is that the nation which staked out this claim in an area that had never been staked out by any other nation would have the right to it.

Mr. ENGLE. That is precisely correct, in my opinion, and I believe that the claim would be sustained in world opinion. This treaty, so far as that particular claim is concerned, would not be worth the paper it is written on.

Mr. THURMOND. I thank the able and distinguished Senator from California for the questions he has propounded and for the discussion he has stimulated on this subject. He is to be commended for his great knowledge of the subject and the contribution he has made on this topic.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, if the Antarctic Treaty were a treaty between nations with which we are friendly and which, in the past, had upheld previous treaties, I would not raise serious objection to ratification of the Antarctic Treaty.

However, this treaty not only involves friendly nations but it also involves Russia, a nation which has repeatedly trampled treaties into the dirt and treated treaties like scraps of paper. One of the great dangers I see in ratification of the Antarctic Treaty is that, once again, we will be giving away something for nothing, so to speak.

Russia has never laid any legitimate claim in the Antarctic, and ratification of this treaty will legitimatize the claim which Russia has never been entitled to. By the same token, the United States has never laid a legitimate claim to any territory in the Antarctic and, in fact, the U.S. Government has never decided what we would lay claim to if the treaty were to be ratified.

Because of these two points, I think the ratification of this treaty would amount to our "shooting in the dark," so to speak. As in all such treaties that were born in ignorance in our past history, if this treaty is ratified, we will come out of the short end.

Unless we know what we intend to lay claim to, and know what Russia and other countries intend to lay claim to, then I fear we will wind up with nothing but an ice shelf, while others will become heir to whatever value there is in the Antarctic area. We know little of the Antarctic, and it seems rather ridiculous to be making a treaty concerning an unknown quantity.

I suggest the United States determine its geographical claim to the Antarctic before we enter into any agreement with any nation which has already established legitimate claims, or which has not established claims. Personally, I think the State Department and the executive branches of the Government through the years, not only the present administration, have been derelict in their duty for not having determined our legitimate claims in the Antarctic.

We must not stamp approval on a vacuum of nothingness here today, but should delay action on this treaty until such time as the United States can come up with its claim to certain areas of the Antarctic which have been explored by us. No nation on earth has done more to open the eyes of the world to the potentials of the Antarctic than has the United States; yet the United States is now ready to stamp approval on a treaty before we even have established claim for our tremendous expenditures and work.

There is something wrong in America's foreign policy, and it is a serious wrong. We have become reactors instead of actors. We jump every time we are pricked internationally, but we never seem to move to prevent the prick.

Our position of leadership in the world has seriously deteriorated. If a nation is to remain a leader, it must be active in leadership. We must stop reacting and begin to affirmatively act. The welfare of humanity depends upon which way we go.

This treaty, in my opinion, is just another reaction and I, for one, do not intend to vote for it. It obtains us nothing, and gives away everything under our stamp of approval.

ORGANIZATION OF AMERICAN STATES ACTION AGAINST CUBA

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I desire to make a few remarks in regard to the treaty, but before doing so, on another subject, I wish to express gratification that the Organization of American States yesterday voted, 20 to 1, to take up the agenda proposed by the United States, and rejected, 20 to 1, an alternative agenda offered by the Cuban Government. The program we supported calls for the foreign ministers to consider "threats of extracontinental intervention," "existing international tensions in the Caribbean," measures to promote greater political stability through higher living standards, and inter-American cooperation "for the defense of the democratic American institutions against the subversive activities of any organization, government, or their agents."

This four-point program, which was even toughened up by the OAS council over the more moderate proposals offered by this country, shows that the rest of Latin America is now as concerned as we are about the increasing Communist domination of Cuba. Apparently the rest of Latin America agreed with us that Cuba's charges of economic and military aggression by the United States against Cuba were nothing but a caricature that bore no connection with reality at all.

Several events have taken place just in the last few days that make it very clear that the Cuban Government is careening along to communism faster than ever. Like a car that has gone out of control, the course of the Cubans veers from side to side, but there can be no doubt that it will end in disaster. Already the Cubans themselves are beginning to wonder who is in the driver's seat. Is it Castro's little brother, who has just returned from what he would like to think was a triumphal tour through Communist Russia? Or is it the sinister figure of Ernesto Guevara, known to have studied Communist tactics behind the Iron Curtain? Whichever of these two is responsible, the latest act of the Cuban Government in seizing all American-owned properties shows only too clearly the malignant machinations of Moscow.

The Catholic bishops of Cuba have announced their distrust of the regime, a position which will have a great deal of influence in Catholic Cuba as time goes on. An increasing number of important Cubans who originally supported Castro have defected from the regime which today seems to allow only Communists to speak their minds.

Khrushchev himself provided the impetus to action by the other Latin American States when he decided to denounce the Monroe Doctrine. As the distinguished columnist, Roscoe Drummond, pointed out, August 6, the Monroe Doctrine is no longer a U.S. fiat to keep other nations out of Latin America. It is an agreed principle of all the American nations together to cooperate in resisting any outside intervention in the Western Hemisphere. When Khrushchev attacked this theory, he was in fact announcing his desire to intervene throughout Latin America. No country in this hemisphere could allow that.

The vote of the OAS reflects the alarm that these latest Cuban and Soviet moves have created. It is in effect a vote of confidence in the farsighted and restrained policies that this administration has followed toward Cuba. President Eisenhower has given the Cuban regime every opportunity to reverse the trend toward communism. There has been no unilateral intervention. The only step we have taken to date against Cuba has been to cancel the sugar quota under which we agreed to pay nearly twice as much as the world price for their produce.

Our patience is paying off dividends now in the willingness of the other Latin American States to go along with us in studying the Cuban problem. I hope that the OAS will continue to justify the faith that the United States and the rest of Latin America has posed in it.

I hope the OAS will come up with a strong program to quarantine the Communist infection in Cuba until the Cuban people themselves can see the falsehood of their leaders and themselves can choose the political, religious, and economic freedom that they rightly desire.

THE ANTARCTIC TREATY

The Senate resumed the consideration of Executive B (86th Cong., 2d sess.), the Antarctic Treaty, signed at Washington on December 1, 1959.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, the Antarctic Treaty that we are now considering represents a forward-looking and realistic approach to an area that could otherwise explode at any moment into cold war tensions or, indeed, under conceivable circumstances, into even worse than that. It represents a constructive step in the direction of international cooperation at a time when such steps have too often been blocked by Soviet intransigence.

Basically, the purpose of the treaty is to prevent the Antarctic continent, as big as the United States and Europe combined, from becoming a source of cold war friction and discord. The treaty provides that Antarctica shall be used entirely for peaceful purposes, that no nuclear tests shall be conducted in the area, that no territorial rights shall be recognized or considered, and that every signatory nation shall have complete rights of unilateral inspection in order to satisfy itself that the treaty is being obeyed. In other words, the Antarctic continent will be neutralized, or internationalized, or, in the words of some punsters, put into cold storage. For the duration of the treaty, no territorial claims can be made, altered, confirmed, or affected in any way by action of the signatories.

The treaty, which was negotiated as a result of American initiative, has been signed by representatives of 12 nations, including the United States, the Soviet Union, and every nation which has ever advanced serious claims to the region. Most of these nations are waiting for the United States, which took the lead in advocating the treaty, to take the lead in ratifying it.

It is my firm belief that the advantages of this agreement far outweigh the possible disadvantages. Nevertheless, opponents of the treaty have raised a number of points against it which might at first sight seem valid. I should like, therefore, to take this opportunity to look carefully into the arguments which have been raised against the treaty, and to point out their weaknesses.

First, some people have argued that we should never have invited the Soviet Union to sign the treaty at all, that we are merely giving the Russians a new forum, a new area in which to make trouble. But this is not the case at all. We are not giving the Soviet Union anything which the Russians do not in fact already have. The Russians claim that the continent was discovered by one of their explorers in 1820. Ever since the International Geophysical Year, 1955–56, the Soviet Union has had a large number of scientific stations in the Antarctic. In fact, Soviet research in the area has been second only to ours and considerably greater than that of several other nations which have made large territorial claims. Moreover, article IV of the treaty explicitly states that the claims, bases of claims, and rights of the contracting nations are not to be altered in any way for the duration of the treaty, which will be at least 30 years. In other words, far from giving the Russians a chance to establish themselves further in Antarctica, the treaty would make it legally impossible for them to do so.

Some people argue that this whole procedure is artificial. They say that we should simply go right ahead and claim a large share of Antarctica for ourselves and negotiate with the other nations which have such claims to settle overlapping claims. This procedure, they say, would leave Russia out in the cold, because the Russians have made no specific territorial claim so far. Perhaps at one point, right after the Second World War, we could have done this, but such unilateral action is no longer possible today. The only way that we could, in fact, eliminate the Russians from Antarctica now is by driving them out with brute force, risking a third world war. Few, I think, would argue that desolate, unpopulated Antarctica was worth a world war or any kind of "police action."

The United States has never claimed territorial sovereignty for itself over any part of Antarctica, even though American explorers, and particularly the remarkable Admiral Byrd, have always played a leading role in the discovery and exploration of the continent. We have never recognized the claims of any other nation in Antarctica. The reason for this restraint is that international law requires territorial sovereignty be established not only by discovery but also by continuous occupation and settlement. Since Antarctica is unfit for natural human habitation neither the United States nor any other country has maintained settlements there, except briefly for scientific purposes. Therefore, in our eyes no claim for ownership of the continent is possible by any nation.

The Russian Government has, since the end of the Second World War, adopted the same position as we have in this matter. Although they do not claim any specific part of the continent for themselves, at the same time they do not recognize the claim of other nations to sovereignty. Like ourselves, they have established scientific bases and stations without requesting permission of any other nations which might have had claims there.

Since the attempt to delineate different national spheres of control would at once cause conflict between many of the treaty signatories, it was decided, very wisely, I believe, to freeze all territorial claims for the time being and to keep the entire area open to all nations which had legitimate scientific programs to carry out within it. In this way, the United States is not restricted to a narrow sector itself, but can carry out researches wherever they might be most useful.

Another important feature which is often ignored by the small minority which opposes the treaty is that it permits to us, as to all signatory powers, a right of unfettered unilateral inspection. It permits aerial and ground inspection at any time, and inspection of ships, aircraft, and stations. Should the Soviets want to use the continent for military purposes or to set up military installations there in violation of the terms of the treaty, such moves could be immediately detected and publicized by the United States.

Mr. President, I do not wish to be misunderstood on this point, which I consider to be vital. I know that the Soviets have violated a good many more treaties than they have honored. I know that Soviet promises are not as good as the paper on which they are written. I know that Khrushchev and those who will be his successors would not hesitate for a moment to break any part of any agreement that suits them. The longstanding crisis over Berlin proves that only too well. But I do not think the Soviet Union would have anything to gain by breaking its pledge to 11 other nations and setting up a highly vulnerable base in a remote area difficult to supply and even more difficult to maintain. Furthermore, our Department of Defense has approved ratification of the treaty, pointing out that in the present advanced state of weapons development an exposed Arctic base would be no threat to free world security and hence would offer no great appeal to Russian strategists.

Moreover, even if the treaty were to be violated by the Soviet Union, the result would merely be a reversion to the present status of conflicting claims. The worst that could happen would be a return to the existing situation. We have nothing to lose by giving the Russians a chance to abide by the treaty, and a good deal to gain in the area of international cooperation.

Some critics have suggested that we are making a mistake to forbid nuclear testing and the disposal of nuclear waste in this area before any overall nuclear ban with inspection has been agreed upon. But the answer to this argument is very simple. The nations of the Southern Hemisphere would simply not have accepted the treaty if it had not contained this provision. The winds at the South Pole all blow toward the North, and any radiation generated in Antarctica would very quickly blow over nations of the Southern Hemisphere. The treaty offers so many other positive advantages that, even though we may consider this a disadvantage, it is hardly sufficient reason to reject the agreement or to antagonize the nations which are adjacent to Antarctica.

Another objection which has been raised is that we may be surrendering valuable economic rights in Antarctica by not staking a definite claim. There are several answers to this. One of the experts testifying before the Foreign Relations Committee on the treaty declared that he would not give a nickel for the whole mineral wealth of Antarctica. Extraction and transportation expenses would be prohibitive for many years to come. And even if mineral or other wealth should be found, the discovering nation would have complete liberty to exploit it as desired. What we found could remain ours.

I have tried at some length to rebut the main arguments that have been used against the treaty because I think they can be very misleading. We are not handing over Antarctica to the Russians. We are not giving them any rights that we do not have for ourselves. And we are not by any means renouncing our concern for the future peaceful study and exploration of the area.

Now I should like to mention very briefly what I consider to be the positive merits of the treaty, for it is important not only in a negative way in order to prevent possible future clashes, but also in a positive way to indicate new roads to international agreement. I lay special stress on the treaty stipulation in the matter of inspection, for that is of vital and far-reaching significance. On the one hand it will insure full protection against any violation of the treaty. On the other hand, it will constitute an invaluable testing experience in the technique and mechanics of international inspection. The need for a workable, effective means of international inspection has been the cornerstone of U.S. disarmament policy ever since the end of the Second World War. If we reject this treaty, which allows such thorough inspection by any of the signatories, our whole disarmament policy will look like sham and propaganda. By ratifying the treaty, we can show that we really mean what we say about control of armaments with international inspection and we can perhaps lay a foundation for other agreements of wide scope.

And finally, I should like to emphasize the arguments made by the distinguished columnist Arthur Krock in the New York Times last week. This Antarctic Treaty can provide an excellent precedent for the determination of sovereignty conflicts in outer space. Supposing the Russians should land on the moon or another planet first, we could point to this treaty and make it clear that we would not recognize any claims not based on continuous settlement. Then this treaty would become an excellent model for future arrangements. Whereas if we rejected this treaty now, we would be simply inviting the Russians to get to outer space first and claim it all for themselves. This treaty, as Arthur Krock rightly asserts, "is a vital defense policy in the space age."

For all these reasons then, and with the full concurrence of all the departments of the Government including the Department of Defense and the Atomic Energy Commission, this treaty has been signed and presented to the Senate of the United States for its advice and consent. I believe we would be doing a great disservice to the long term interests of this country if we did not ratify the treaty promptly and by a large majority. It can open the way not only to the peaceful development of Antarctica but also to the more important agreements on disarmament and outer space which we will be striving to reach in the future.

In my judgment we would perform a significant service in the ratification of this treaty.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, I rise to give support to an affirmative vote on the ratification of the treaty. The President of the Senate at the present time knows that I am a member of the Foreign Relations Committee. I was rather diligent in my attendance during the hearings that were conducted, when testimony was taken on the negative and positive aspects of this document. When the hearings began I gave recognition to the fact that there should be no yielding to the Soviets. I did not become a slave to the proposition that we should become signatories to the treaty so as to avoid complications with the Soviets.

The testimony discloses that this continent has an area equal to that of the United States and all of Europe, and that it is covered with an ice cap having a thickness averaging 1 mile, and in some places a thickness of 14,000 feet. There is one area of about 200,000 square miles that has a temperature at its warmest of 20° Fahrenheit above zero. The testimony further discloses that traces of about 175 minerals have been found, and that there is an abundance of coal of a low grade lignite quality.

Geologists have expressed the view that because of the very fierce winds and cold, the prospects of using any natural resources or minerals that might be found are slender. There are areas in which the temperature reaches 120° below zero Fahrenheit. As the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] stated, the fierce winds blow at times with a velocity of 200 miles an hour.

I think that one must select one of two courses to be followed: First, to declare the policy of our country to be that this vast continent shall be an international zone, controlled by international law, without being fragmentized in accordance with the claims that are existent and made by seven nations of the world.

The second course would be a declaration of policy by the United States that it is its conviction that our country will best be served, and the peace of the world will be insured, by dividing this continent in accordance with the existing claims made by seven nations and the prospect of claims which might be made by the United States and perhaps others.

What is the participation of our Government in the discovery and exploration of Antarctica? The testimony shows that in 1820 Palmer went into that area with a sailing vessel. That is about the beginning of our known contact with Antarctica.

In 1839–40, Lieutenant Wilkes of the U.S. Navy sailed along the coast and saw parts of this vast continent.

On the other hand, with respect to the Soviets, there is evidence that a Fabian von Bellingshausen in 1820 in a Russian sea vessel, was in that area and beheld this vast continent of land.

From 1840, when Wilkes sailed along that coast, down to 1928, I believe, when the explorers of our Government became interested, no action was taken by our country.

Since 1928 action has been rather intense, as reflected by the travels of Admiral Byrd and the flights made by our Navy over Antarctica. The Soviets, since the time of Bellingshausen, took no action regarding that area until 1948. In that year, when a meeting was proposed for the purpose of resolving conflicting claims, the Soviets said they had a right to a voice in the decisions. Our country has said that we have the basis for claims. However, neither the Soviets nor our country, although each might have made claims, asserted them.

That, in a nutshell, is my understanding of the basic facts upon which we have to make our decision.

It is argued by the opponents that by the treaty we are giving up valuable rights, and that the rights which accrued to us in 1820, when Palmer sailed along the coast, and in 1839, when Wilkes traveled halfway down the coast, and through the travels of Admiral Byrd will be yielded in the event we subscribe to the treaty.

If that is true, I respectfully submit that the claims of the Soviets will likewise become invalidated.

However, that is not so. The treaty, in conclusive and direct language, specifically states, as I shall later point out, that established rights are not abandoned by the treaty. I put this question to my fellow Senators. Having in mind the nonusability of this land, the tremendous ice cap which covers it, the existence of seven established claims, the conflict with respect to the seven established claims, and the conflict which will arise between our Nation and the Soviets, is it to our advantage to have this area declared a neutral zone of the world, governed by international law, free from military bases and military activity, or, on the other hand, would we be better served by fragmentizing the continent, assigning it to seven nations, and then be faced with the prospect of a conflict between the Soviets and ourselves?

In my judgment, the answer is that, having in mind the provisions of the treaty, it would be to the best interest of our country and to the world to have the area neutralized, governed by international law, and used solely for scientific and research purposes.

I should like for a moment to discuss the treaty. I will rather hurriedly but with sufficient detail take up the various articles of the treaty.

Article I declares:

1. Antarctica shall be used for peaceful purposes only. There shall be prohibited, inter alia, any measures of a military nature, such as the establishment of military bases and fortifications, the carrying out of military maneuvers, as well as the testing of any type of weapons.

That is a sound provision. If it is to be neutralized and kept free of military bases as far as the United States is concerned, it follows that the same treatment will be accorded to the Soviets.

Article II provides:

Freedom of scientific investigation in Antarctica and cooperation toward that end, as applied during the International Geophysical Year, shall continue, subject to the provisions of the present Treaty.

That, in effect, means free from military bases and military activity, and devoted solely to scientific research of benefit to the people of the world.

Article III provides:

1. In order to promote international cooperation in scientific investigation in Antarctica, as provided for in Article II of the present Treaty, the Contracting Parties agree that, to the greatest extent feasible and practicable:

(a) information regarding plans for scientific programs in Antarctica shall be exchanged to permit maximum economy and efficiency of operations;

(b) scientific personnel shall be exchanged in Antarctica between expeditions and stations;

(c) scientific observations and results from Antarctica shall be exchanged and made freely available.

Article IV, in my opinion, is a very significant part of the treaty, and refutes in a substantial degree the argument made throughout yesterday and today about the United States giving up rights which are now vested in it. It provides:

1. Nothing contained in the present Treaty shall be interpreted as:

(a) a renunciation by any Contracting Party of previously asserted rights of or claims to territorial sovereignty in Antarctica;

(b) a renunciation or diminution by any Contracting Party of any basis of claim to territorial sovereignty in Antarctica which it may have whether as a result of its activities or those of its nationals in Antarctica, or otherwise;

(c) prejudicing the position of any Contracting Party as regards its recognition or non-recognition of any other State's right of or claim or basis of claim to territorial sovereignty in Antarctica.

The basis of claim of the United States is the sailing of Palmer in 1820, of Wilkes in 1839, and, beginning in 1928, the explorations of Admiral Byrd and of those who followed him, down to this very day.

Paragraph 2 of article IV contains a provision which deals with the ability to predicate new claims upon activities which take place while the treaty is in existence. Paragraph 2 reads:

No acts or activities taking place while the present Treaty is in force shall constitute a basis for asserting, supporting, or denying a claim to territorial sovereignty in Antarctica or create any rights of sovereignty in Antarctica.

Those who argue that as a consequence of activity under the treaty rights will be acquired completely ignore the conclusive and specific language contained in paragraph 2 of article IV of the document.

Article V, paragraph 1, provides:

Any nuclear explosions in Antarctica and the disposal there of radioactive waste material shall be prohibited.

That follows the recommendations set forth in article I, which specifically provides that no military use shall be made of the continent of Antarctica.

Article VI provides:

The provisions of the present Treaty shall apply to the area south of 60° South Latitude, including all ice shelves, but nothing in the present Treaty shall prejudice or in any way affect the rights, or the exercise of the rights, of any state under international law with regard to the high seas within that area.

That article means that the international law with respect to the high seas shall continue in full force and effect.

Article VII provides:

In order to promote the objectives and ensure the observance of the provisions of the present Treaty, each Contracting Party whose representatives are entitled to participate in the meetings referred to in Article IX of the Treaty shall have the right to designate observers to carry out any inspection provided for by the present Article.

While that language is self-explanatory, I point out, as the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations [Mr. FULBRIGHT] pointed out, that here we have a treaty which contemplates the elimination of military development, but provides for adequate inspection among the observers. That inspection, according to article VII, may be made by divers means, including observation from airplanes, and otherwise.

I come now to article VIII:

In order to facilitate the exercise of their functions under the present Treaty, and without prejudice to the respective positions of the Contracting Parties relating to jurisdiction over all other persons in Antarctica, observers designated under paragraph 1 of Article VII and scientific personnel exchanged under subparagraph 1(b) of Article III of the Treaty, and members of the staffs accompanying any such persons, shall be subject only to the jurisdiction of the Contracting Party of which they are nationals.

I assume that provision was specifically included to destroy the arguments which might be made by those who claim that we are subjecting American citizens to the judicial tribunals of other nations.

Next is article IX:

Representatives of the Contracting Parties named in the preamble to the present Treaty shall meet at the City of Canberra within two months after the date of entry into force of the Treaty, and thereafter at suitable intervals and places, for the purpose of exchanging information, consulting together on matters of common interest pertaining to Antarctica, and formulating and considering, and recommending to their Governments, measures in furtherance of the principles and objectives of the Treaty * * *.

The article then contains subparagraphs identified as (a), (b), (c), (d), (e), and (f).

This article becomes extremely important because the contracting parties agree to meet; they will create a consultative body; and that consultative body will make recommendations for technical implementation of the treaty.

One particular question may quickly arise after that meeting is had. In the event minerals are actually discovered in Antarctica, and in the event they are capable of being transported, to whom will they belong?

As I recall, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN] raised that question in the hearings, following some questions which I put to representatives of the Department of State. The Department of State answered that, under this article, the consultative agency will make recommendations for the signatories, and subsequently provisions can be made concerning the distribution of the minerals which might be found.

I now proceed to article X:

Each of the Contracting Parties undertakes to exert appropriate efforts, consistent with the Charter of the United Nations, to the end that no one engages in any activity in Antarctica contrary to the principles or purposes of the present Treaty.

That article contemplates that whatever is done shall be consistent with the principles and the provisions of the Charter of the United Nations.

I come now to article XI. I think this is a very important article. It deals with the manner in which disputes shall be decided. Constantly the argument is raised that we are submitting to the International Court of Justice questions relating to the sovereignty of the United States. Article XI provides:

1. If any dispute arises between two or more of the Contracting Parties concerning the interpretation or application of the present Treaty, those contracting parties shall consult among themselves with a view to having the dispute resolved by negotiation, inquiry, mediation, conciliation, arbitration, judicial settlement, or other peaceful means of their own choice.

2. Any dispute of this character not so resolved shall, with the consent, in each case, of all parties to the dispute, be referred to the International Court of Justice for settlement.

To those who would argue against the treaty on the basis that we would submit ourselves to an International Court of Justice, the answer is available that our consent must be given, at the time, that the International Court of Justice shall settle the dispute.

Article XII deals with how modifications of the treaty shall be made. It provides that the modifications shall have the approval of all the contracting parties.

Article XIII deals with how the ratification shall be made. At this point I invite attention to the fact that on December 1, 1959, the 12 signatories to this document met and subscribed to it. Their signatures are already on the document.

My recollection is that five nations have thus far ratified the agreements made by their official representatives. The United Kingdom, which already has claims, has ratified it. Norway, which has asserted claims, has ratified it. The United States has not ratified it, except by the signature of the representatives of the U.S. Government. So the treaty is now before us, for our consideration.

Finally, Mr. President, the treaty provides that it shall be in effect for at least 30 years. That is provided for in article XII. At the end of 30 years the treaty may be reviewed at a conference called by one of the consultative parties.

Mr. President, my own belief is that at the end of 30 years it will be found that the declaration of this area to be a neutral zone, governed by international law, devoid of military equipment or bases, but devoted to scientific research, will be continued.

Earlier in my remarks I said that I do not wish to yield to the Soviets. I do not subscribe to the arguments, made in the last 2 days, that our only alternative is to engage in combat with the Soviets. If we yield constantly to that argument, we shall be yielding to every inordinate demand that the Communists may wish to make.

There are other valid and good reasons why this should be done. I would say, first, that we have repeatedly claimed and stated to the world that the United States is not intent upon expansion or acquisition of lands to which it is not justly entitled. Since 1924, when Charles Evans Hughes declared that the United States was not making any claims to these territories, the position of our Government has been the same. If today we were to say to the world, "Break up Antarctica; give the part between 90° and 150° W. longitude to the United States, and give all the other parts of the Antarctic to the six other nations that have made claims," nothing but confusion and trouble could arise.

We now have the chance to demonstrate to the world, by our action, that we believe in the neutralization of such areas for peaceful pursuits and the elimination of military bases and military equipment. On that score, the Soviets constantly speak about discontinuance of nuclear tests and about disarmament. However, the Soviets act contrary to their spoken words.

We have spoken for peace and for disarmament and for abandoning nuclear weapons. In Antarctica we can achieve that most effectively.

It is for these reasons that I urge that the Senate ratify this treaty.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DODD] is prepared to address the Senate. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, on June 28, I took the Senate floor to express my opposition to ratification of the Antarctic Treaty. I did so, I may say, only after the most serious reflection, because I truly believe that it is a very grave matter for the Senate to refuse to ratify a treaty, especially one initiated and drafted by the Government of the United States.

I regard this question as a very grave one; and I do not feel happy about my position in regard to it. I suppose that in the past other Senators have likewise felt impelled to oppose the ratification of treaties initiated by the U.S. Government, and so in that connection they have had somewhat the same feelings that I had in June, and have tonight.

I do not believe that the position I take in regard to the pending question could be taken by any Senator or could be recommended by any Senator except after the most scrupulous and thorough consideration.

Furthermore I regret very much that more of my colleagues are not now in the Chamber—not because I am speaking, but, rather, because I think some very worthwhile arguments have been made here, both yesterday and today, and I believe they merit the attention of the entire Senate.

I am fearful, too, that the American people are not aware of what is now at issue. It is little wonder that they are not aware of it. In the first place, the facts have not been presented to them. In the second place, there have been the considerable distractions of the two great national political conventions, which have only recently ended.

Mr. President, if the American people were really fully informed about the treaty, I believe that those of us in this Chamber would hear from them in great numbers—because I have great confidence in their good sense—and I believe they would be urging those of us who represent them not to vote for ratification of the treaty.

Those of us who oppose ratification of the treaty are laboring under other handicaps. The Senate Committee on Foreign Relations—justifiably, I believe—has great prestige and power, and its members have exceptional experience and competence. That committee has recommended ratification of the treaty, without a dissenting voice. Against this background, one in my position could rise to oppose ratification of the treaty only with some timidity, and hesitation or, in lieu of this, only with temerity.

However, Mr. President, conscience compels that I oppose ratification of the treaty. I hope my colleagues will heed, or at least will read, what those of us who oppose ratification of the treaty have to say.

I do not think I can be charged with being particularly partisan or bitter toward this administration; I hope I never am toward any administration; so when I say "with all due respect to the administration," I mean every word of it. I truly and deeeply feel and believe that the Antarctic Treaty is one instance in which refusal of ratification—at this time—would be justified.

No arguments I have heard over the intervening period since I made my remarks on June 28 have in any way changed the opinions I expressed on that occasion. On the contrary, everything that I have read and heard since that date has only served to strengthen my conviction that the Antarctic Treaty represents an unwarranted surrender of our hard-won rights in the Antarctic; that it gives the Soviet Union a status in the Antarctic to which it is not entitled; and that it constitutes a potential danger to the security of the free world.

Last night my friend and colleague the able junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. MCGEE] stated with great clarity, with effectiveness, and, indeed, with eloquence, the case for ratification of the treaty. So did the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. LAUSCHE] this afternoon, for whose general opinions and thinking I have the greatest respect.

If we were to accept the basic premises of the argument offered by my colleague the distinguished Senator from Wyoming, then everything that he said was logical, consistent, and sensible. But I do not accept those basic premises; and I want to tell my colleagues why.

I think I can safely summarize the thesis of the Senator from Wyoming in the following way: Because I struggled with this question today and we all want to be extremely fair in characterizing the remarks of a colleague.

It seems to me the Senator from Wyoming accepted as a permanent fact, first of all, the presence of Russia in Antarctica.

Second, as a permanent fact, the failure of the United States to claim any of that territory.

Thirdly, as a permanent fact, the absence of any system of international control in that territory other than that proposed by the treaty.

I think this is a fair summation of the argument.

The Senator from Wyoming laid before us three alternative courses of action. I read the statement of the Senator from Wyoming as carefully as I could. It seems to me he said our choices were these: We could, without legal basis, push the Russians out of the Antarctic by force, if we were willing to risk world war. That is one of the arguments he made. Or, he said, we could merely reject the treaty, which would do nothing to alter the fact of Russia's dangerous presence in the Antarctic, and which would leave in existence the present anarchy that exists there.

In addition, he said, we could set up a system of international control of the Antarctic by the proposed treaty, thereby acting in harmony with our free world allies in the government of this territory and placing the existence of Soviet Russia there under international control. This, said my friend and colleague from Wyoming, would place restrictions upon the Russians which, if they were violated, would give the free world a moral and legal basis for united action against Russia in the Antarctic.

I think that is a fair summary of the position outlined so competently and ably by my colleague from Wyoming and by others who have spoken on the same side.

If those were the only alternatives, who could doubt that we should accept the proposed treaty? But the fact is that they are not. This is merely a repetition of the song that has been sung so many times in recent years:

"Will you do what we suggest, or are you willing to start a war?"

Consequently, those who take a different view are put in the position of either agreeing with the course recommended or being stigmatized as advocates of a general war.

In the course of what I have to say—and I do not intend to delay the Senate too long—I hope I shall be able to deal with the basic arguments advanced in favor of the treaty and to present a realistic alternative to the Antarctic Treaty, because that, I think, is what is required at this hour in the circumstances in which we find ourselves.

The rights of the United States in the Antarctic are based on priority; on intensive exploration over a period of decades; on human habitation for many years, but, of necessity, human habitation on a limited scale.

There was an American captain, Nathaniel Palmer, sailing from Stonington, Conn.—my own State—who, in 1820, first sighted the Antarctic Continent. Nobody disputes this. It is an important fact, and it is an interesting one for me to note.

During the greater part of the 19th century, scores of American vessels probed the waters of the Antarctic because they were hunting seals. That is what our New England sea captains were doing there in the early 19th century, and that is how they came to discover these lands. In the course of their seal hunts they saw the place and they were careful and prudent enough to report on what they saw in their ship's logs.

In 1839, another great American seaman, Adm. Charles Wilkes, established the existence of the Antarctic Continent by sailing around most of it and mapping it.

The period of extensive explorations, of course, began about 90 years later, with the first South Polar expedition of the late great Adm. Richard Evelyn Byrd. As a result of the repeated expeditions of Admiral Byrd, the activities of other American explorers like Lincoln Ellsworth and Finn Ronne, and our several massive Government expeditions since 1946, the United States has explored far more of the Antarctic Continent than all the other nations put together.

That is the record. We poured in millions of dollars. We poured in the lives of our people. We have done more work there than all the other nations which lay claims put together.

I have dealt very briefly with our record priority and exploration in the Antarctic, principally because the distinguished junior Senator from California [Mr. ENGLE] covered the subject so well in his masterful presentation yesterday.

Other nations with much more modest records of accomplishment in the Antarctic than the United States followed up on the activities of their nationals by filing claims to sections of the Antarctic continent.

In 1955 on the eve of the International Geophysical Year, the claimant nations included Australia, New Zealand, Great Britain, France, Norway, Argentina, and Chile. The United States, which had done all the great work, which had poured in untold human effort and millions of dollars in exploratory work, made no claim. I shall never understand what motivated our inaction. I do not know why the United States did not make its claim, considering all it had done, when other countries which had done much less were making their claims. But the fact is, we did not do so.

Perhaps it was the same lack of foresight and imagination which once caused the purchase of Alaska to be described as "Seward's Folly," or which made it impossible for Admiral Byrd to gain any Government support for his South Polar expeditions until as late as 1939.

Perhaps it was the traditional American hostility to everything which smacks of foreign possessions and foreign claims and colonialism—although there is some doubt in my mind as to whether penguins can properly be considered colonial subjects.

Whatever the reasons may have been, we obstinately refused, under both Democratic and Republican administrations, to file our claims.

The argument has been made that the present treaty is preferable to the division of Antarctica among seven or eight claimant nations.

I have heard it said that, if we had filed claim, we might have found ourselves limited to the one-sixth of the Antarctic Continent which had not been claimed by other nations and where our own interests, by common consent, were paramount.

Under the treaty, we and all other nations have access to all the continent, so we are not limited to one-sixth of it.

I thought about this argument when I heard it and when I read it. I believe it is oversimplified and misleading. Let us think about it. Claims are staked out by seven claimant nations, but they overlap each other at several points, and they seriously overlap the area to which the United States has superior potential claims.

Had we been able to come together in a conference with the other claimant nations for the specific purpose of reaching a common agreement, I am confident that any compromise would have given the United States much more than the one-sixth portion of the continent which the other nations had not claimed. Whether such an agreement would have given us 5 or 10 percent more or less of the continent is, in my judgment, of no importance. Under any conceivable compromise we would certainly have received a far larger segment of the continent than any other nation.

But, for the sake of an hypothesis, let us assume that such a conference had taken place and that we emerged from it with a recognized claim to one-sixth, only, of that continent. I say, in all earnestness, that such an arrangement would have been infinitely preferable to the treaty which is now before the Senate for ratification.

I repeat that if we had received one-sixth of the continent as the result of a conference with all the claimants, we would be better off tonight than we are, faced with the ratification of the treaty. Why? Because by an accident of history all the claimant nations prior to the International Geophysical Year were nations of the free world. That is something we have not talked much about, but I am one who believes it ought to be discussed.

Any agreement with the nations of the free world, I think, would have had the effect of converting the Antarctic Continent into a preserve of the free world. And I am confident it would have given these nations complete access for scientific purposes to any part of that continent subject only to the formality of notification.

It is true that the claimant nations had shown themselves obstinate about composing their differences. There is nothing unusual about that. That is as old a situation as the history of the world has recorded. Differences were inevitable in the absence of a clearly defined American position and in the absence of American leadership. Does anyone really wonder that the other claimants were quarreling with each other, when we stood aloof, with the best claim, with the largest claim, never asserted? It is little wonder that a few of these nations fell into difficulties with each other. We never seriously tried to help them resolve their difficulties.

Some may say, "This is prophecy after the fact." But, Mr. President, I venture the suggestion that, had we taken the lead, when we should have done so, in convening a conference of the interested nations, even as late as 1954 or even 1955, an agreement could have been achieved.

At that time the Soviet Union was already talking of participation in the Antarctic phase of the International Geophysical Year. It should have been obvious that, in the absence of an agreement among the United States and the several other claimant nations, the Soviet Union would neither recognize our rights nor request our permission to use the area.

It should have been obvious, also, that when the International Geophysical Year was over we would be confronted with the problem of a continuing Soviet presence in Antarctica.

That is as plain as a finger in front of one's face.

It should have been as plain then as it is tonight to anyone in charge of our international affairs.

There is nothing mysterious about it.

There is nothing "prophetic after the fact" about this.

In fact, if anyone has any doubt about that statement, let me hasten to add that several of our friends in other countries at that time expressed serious worry and concern over the very possibility of which I speak tonight. That is a fact of history.

Mr. President, with such an incentive I truly believe an intelligent compromise could certainly have been found among free nations, which have, after all basically common interests.

Instead of this continent becoming a free world domain under the terms of a free world treaty, the Antarctic Continent, it is now proposed in the treaty before us, is to be converted into an international domain where the free world and the Communist slave world are to enjoy equal rights. That is what the treaty says. It amounts to putting the free world and the slave world on the same footing by a treaty arrangement.

At the moment, the Communist world is represented in the Antarctic only by the Soviet Union.

But, according to persistent reports, the Kremlin is already planning to turn over several bases to its European satellites. We do not talk about that probability here either.

Where do I get the information?

Read our periodicals, our magazines, in which it is reliably reported that the Kremlin intends to turn over to its satellites several of these bases under the terms of a treaty.

Soon we shall find ourselves cohabiting not only with the Soviets and the European satellites, but with scientific expeditions sent into Antarctica by Red China. After that, we shall find ourselves admitting Red China to the concert of Antarctic Treaty nations as a later signatory. I make that prediction, if this treaty is ratified.

The language of the treaty and the report of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee assure us that the treaty in no way prejudices the rights of the United States in the Antarctic Continent, and that essentially the situation remains as it was. It is said that we make no claims and that we recognize no claims, but we reserve our rights.

These assurances, however, in my judgment—and I do not question the good intentions of those who make them—are reduced to meaningless doubletalk in the light of the clear implications of the treaty itself.

I think that Dr. Philip Jessup displayed much more realism and much more candor when he said in his testimony before the Foreign Relations Committee:

> As has been pointed out, the treaty would prevent the development of previously asserted claims of other countries to parts of Antarctica.

If I am in error I should be glad to be questioned about my reasoning, but I ask: If what Dr. Jessup has said is true, how can one possibly argue that the treaty would not prevent the development of our own rights into claims, and after that, of course, the formal development of our claims?

I do not think it can be argued otherwise.

It would be illogical to pretend otherwise or to assert otherwise.

Moreover, the treaty prohibits any claims based upon exploratory activities carried on over the next 30 years.

I think it is a matter of elementary logic that the denial of any right to a claim based upon future activities certainly invalidates or, at the least, seriously weakens our own rights and the rights of other nations based upon previous exploratory activities.

Again I wish the proponents of ratification of the treaty would question my logic and my facts, if they care to do so. I do not know how the point can be controverted.

I would have much more respect for the language of the treaty, and for the arguments of the administration and the proponents of the treaty if they were candid and frank with us on this point—for example, if they stood up and said: "The United States and the other nations have long-established rights in the Antarctic. But in the overriding interest of world peace, we and they should forget about rights and claims that have been filed, or that have been neglected, or which have been considered for filing, and instead we ought to convert the Antarctic into an international territory where the free world and the Communist world can cohabit on terms of equality."

I would have much more respect for those who argue for this treaty if they made that kind of argument, instead of saying that we are not giving up any rights or claims—which, of course, we are.

The longer rights go unasserted, of course, the more difficult it is to assert them. Rights are like muscles. If we do not use muscles, they become soft, fat, and weak. The same process occurs with rights, too.

In my judgment, the Antarctic Treaty, if ratified, would create a political situation which would make it virtually impossible for us to develop our claims.

I am as certain as I have ever been of anything in my life that if the treaty is ratified we will never assert our rights. These are the real implications of the Antarctic Treaty. This is what we are being asked to accept. This is what we shall be approving if we vote for ratification.

Let there be no illusion on this score.

The report of the Committee on Foreign Relations argues:

> The treaty does not create a Soviet presence in Antarctica, but merely deals with an existing situation.

That, I believe, is a half truth which completely circumvents the question, and I wish to make clear on the RECORD why I say that. If the claims of other nations and the rights of the United States in the Antarctic have any validity at all, then the Soviet Union has been carrying on its International Geophysical Year activities in Antarctica on the basis of a kind of "visitor's visa."

How else can they be there? If our rights are valid and the rights of other claimants are valid, then they are down there with our acquiescence and that of the other claimants. They do not have any rights of their own; they are "visitors for scientific purposes."

The effect of this treaty, if we ratify it, is to grant the Soviet "full citizenship" down there.

Instead of having the status of "visitors for scientific purposes," by this treaty we would give them "full citizenship."

For how long? In perpetuity. This is a point that has not been discussed to any extent.

Interestingly, and conversely, the treaty downgrades the status and rights of the United States and other free nations in the Antarctic. Our own rights and that of other free nations are downgraded, while we are upgrading the rights of the slave empire.

How is this done? By a very intriguing ritual by granting to us, simultaneously and equally with the Soviet Union a right to citizenship, if you please, in the Antarctic Continent, conceived of as an international scientific preserve.

There are some who agree that it would have been preferable if the free world had arrived at an agreement on claims prior to the International Geophysical Year. But the same people, as I have listened to them and have read what they had to say, have argued, "Yes, you are right; it would have been better if we had arrived at some agreement on our claims and the claims of others, but we did not do so."

So they say, "In view of the fact that we did not do what we should have done, the best we can do now is to ratify this treaty."

This troubled me last night and yesterday, and it has troubled me ever since June 28, when I spoke on the floor in opposition to ratification of the treaty. It has troubled me for several reasons. I have been troubled by the lack of logic in it, for one thing.

It has troubled me most of all because, as I understand the line of reasoning of those who favor the treaty—and I always like, as I am sure my colleagues also like, to understand the reasoning of those who oppose my position, it is this: "Yes, we made a mistake, but to correct it might be very embarrassing."

They add: "Therefore, let us not correct our mistake of not asserting our rights, based on the millions of dollars we have poured in, and the manpower and our inventive and exploratory genius, but instead, let us give our mistake legitimacy by negotiating it into a treaty."

That is what they are suggesting by asking us to enter into this treaty.

I would be interested to hear from anyone who has a contrary opinion.

It has been pointed out to us that the treaty gives us an unlimited right of inspection of Soviet bases in the Antarctic.

This is a bewitching and beguilding argument.

Some who are in favor of the treaty say, "Think of that; we are going to get the right of inspection, a right we have never been able to get anywhere else in the world."

Of course that appeals to many people. I understand why. I understand the fear of a terrible war as well as anyone else. However, I suggest to those who make this argument, that the Soviets, who have never accepted any kind of inspection in any other part of the world, have agreed to this unlimited right of inspection, as it is described, for a very simple reason. They have agreed to the unlimited right of inspection in Antarctica because it means nothing, and it protects us and the free world against nothing. That is why they have agreed to it.

The treaty prohibits the establishment of military bases in Antarctica, or the introduction of nuclear weapons on the continent.

For the life of me I can see no possible use for Soviet military bases in Antarctica.

I cannot see why they should want to erect batteries of missiles there.

The Kremlin already has ICBM's capable of hitting Singapore and Australia from Russia. They also have, or will shortly have, submarines with missile capabilities.

They do not need to set up any bases in Antarctica.

I am not a military expert, but I would wager that they never will.

I believe, however, that the Antarctic Continent is of considerable military significance, and that the Soviet Union presently is supporting and will continue to support the Soviet military effort.

Someone who hears me say this will probably say, "That is an inconsistency. He just said that it is of no military significance, that the Soviets do not want to establish any military bases there or any missile bases. Now he says that it has military significance."

Let me explain this apparent inconsistency.

The point is that we live in an age when natural science and military technology are inseparably involved. Meteorology, oceanography, the study of cosmic rays, terrestrial magnetism, the shifting pattern of the earth's magnetic field, and the ionosphere—all of these things, I have been told by competent authority have implications for various aspects of military science in this day and age, including submarine, missile, and space warfare. It has implications far greater than the traditional military terms in which we are accustomed to speak.

So I suggest that it is not missile bases in the Antarctic that the men in the Kremlin want.

They would like to have us think that that is what they are looking for.

I do not believe it, and the best advice that I have obtained tends to prove that I am right.

What they want is scientific information that can be fed into their military planning and military technology.

As Dr. Lawrence Gould, one of the country's top Antarctic scientists, has pointed out to the Committee on Foreign Relations, scientific information is the Antarctic Continent's chief export. There are many natural phenomena which can be studied better in the peculiar conditions of the Antarctic environment than anywhere else in the world. That is the opinion of experts in this field.

Science is a Janus-faced thing. It can serve free mankind or serve the cause of evil and of destruction. History tells us that this is so.

Under the terms of the proposed Antarctic Treaty we might perhaps inspect a Soviet base somewhere on that continent and reach a finding that the base is conducting a purely scientific activity. As a matter of fact, I am confident that we shall never reach any other finding.

The point is that it would be tragically and dangerously misleading to conclude from this that the Soviet activities in Antarctica are in no way related to their military effort, for the reason that I have just outlined.

I am not suggesting that we should at this juncture resort to force to terminate Soviet scientific activities in Antarctica, despite their provocations and threats of war. I would be prepared, unless the international situation became even more acute than it is now, to see the Soviets continue their scientific activities in Antarctica. However, the Antarctic Treaty is certainly not necessary to enable them to carry on these scientific activities. That is precisely the point that I believe should be made very clear.

This treaty is not necessary for that purpose.

There would have been no danger of conflict, no tension, had we let matters stand as they were and not proposed the treaty.

But why give the Soviets in perpetuity rights in that continent to which they are not entitled?

Judging from their history, the chances are 90 to 10, or perhaps even 99 to 1 that they will misuse and abuse such rights, and turn at every opportunity against the free world.

The treaty also gives legitimacy to the Soviets for all time. I wonder how many Senators have considered this aspect of the treaty. I have read it carefully. It is truly deplorable that it should give them rights in perpetuity.

This is something not altogether new in treaties; but it is, nevertheless, something extraordinary. There is no escape clause whatever. Someone will hurry to say that, while the treaty has no fixed time limit, theoretically we can withdraw from the treaty after 30 years. That is true. If the treaty endures for 30 years, the situation by that time will be frozen in perpetuity. But what will happen after the 30 years under the language of the treaty? The only way we can get out of the treaty is by violating it—because the act of withdrawal would be a violation. That is a fine way to bring a treaty, or any other honorable agreement, to a conclusion.

Mr. President, is it an exaggeration to say, or can one be charged with being overdramatic when he says that this is a time of unprecedented crisis?

Is that extreme language?

Is there anyone who doubts that this is an hour of extreme crisis?

Everyone who should know says so.

The President of the United States says so.

His Cabinet says so.

The leaders of my party say so.

The leaders of the free world say so.

Of course, I believe they are right.

It is an hour of unprecedented crisis.

On at least four occasions in the past 2 months Khrushchev has threatened the free world with all-out nuclear war.

Think of that—four times in 60 days.

It is little wonder that our leaders on both sides say that this is a time of unprecedented crisis.

Mr. President, fearfully I say that if the world situation continues to deteriorate at the present rate, I can conceive of a situation in which we would, as a matter of security, as a matter of our own self-preservation wish to terminate the presence of the Soviet Union in the Antarctic.

I ask again, Is it an exaggeration to speak of force in this connection?

Am I speaking in extravagant or reckless terms?

I do not think so.

I am posing and presenting a situation which I say is highly possible.

If the world situation continues to deteriorate at its present rate, what will we be confronted with?

The physical problem would be a very minor one, I believe. There are about 200 members of the several Soviet bases down there. Physically to persuade them to leave Antarctica would not be a great task on the part of the free world in the foreseeable future.

However, much has been made by the proponents of the treaty of the importance of the legalisms of the treaty, and of how much better a posture we would have in the world if we had the protection of those legalisms. It has been argued several times that, at least if we entered into a treaty and ratified it, we would be legalistically better off. The fact of the matter is that, legally, in my opinion, we would be worse off.

We would find it more difficult, if we ratified this treaty, and the situation became worse, and we were truly and honestly fearful of what might be done to us from that area of the world.

It would be much more difficult for us to throw the Soviets out of the Antarctic, as we might be required to do, if we ratified the treaty, than would be the case if we rejected it.

I think it is the sounder and more sensible argument to reject the treaty at this hour.

Conversely, if my logic is correct, we would be in a stronger position to take the action which I hope we will never have to take.

But if the situation requires it, I hope we will not flinch from taking it.

We would be in a much stronger position if a conference of the eight free world nations interested in the Antarctic were to convene, even at this late date, and were to arrive at an agreement on claims and possessions.

I wish to emphasize, because I am speaking from notes which I rather hastily got together, that I have at no time suggested, and do not now propose to suggest, that we expel the Soviets from Antarctica forthwith.

I have never said that.

What I propose is that we should reserve the right to do so if Khrushchev's arrogance and his missile rattling should result in a further deterioration of the international situation.

I say, Mr. President, that this is simple common sense; it is a simple measure to protect the welfare and the freedom of this country.

In the closing years of his life, Adm. Richard E. Byrd, the great American to whom I have referred earlier, had something to say about this continent. In my judgment, Admiral Byrd was one of the truly great Americans of our entire history. He was a great soul, a great mind, a great man, a great scientist, and a great explorer.

What did he tell us, years ago, about this continent, with respect to which it is suggested tonight that we enter into this kind of treaty with the Soviet Union and other nations?

He warned us that, in the event of war—and he made this warning in time of peace—Antarctica would become of critical importance, both to the free world and to the Soviets. That is how farsighted he was.

One had to assume as a matter of high probability, said Admiral Byrd, that in the event of war—the kind of war he contemplated—both the Panama Canal and the Suez Canal would be closed in the early days of such a conflict.

Then he went on to warn us that, in that event, the free world's shipping would be compelled to take the long southerly routes around Cape Horn and the Cape of Good Hope. Operating from the Antarctic seas, Admiral Byrd warned, would be long-range submarines.

Think how wise a man was Admiral Byrd.

He said, years ago, that long-range submarines could play havoc with such shipping.

Remember, he was talking at a time when nuclear-powered submarines were not even dreamed of.

He warned that a few small Soviet bases on the Antarctic Continent or on the surrounding islands could play an important role in guiding and abetting such operations.

That is what Admiral Byrd told us, his countrymen.

Admiral Byrd's remarks on the military potentialities of the Antarctic, I repeat, were made before nuclear-powered submarines were even thought of in this country or had demonstrated their ability to operate in the Arctic seas, all the way up to the North Pole and under it.

Admiral Byrd's early prophecy of the usefulness of the north polar regions has been borne out to the hilt.

Those are words of wisdom spoken by a great American leader, Admiral Byrd.

May we of another and a later day take his advice and his counsel before we rush into hasty, precipitate action which may preclude us from protecting the liberty and freedom we so dearly prize.

I do not make any pretentions to being a military expert.

It may be, as some have said, that Admiral Byrd overestimated the direct military potentialities of the Antarctic in the event of war.

I do not think so.

But even the regular weather information supplied by a few clandestine meteorological stations on the periphery of the Antarctic could be of some importance. The Antarctic, as Admiral Byrd frequently pointed out, is the greatest weather factory in the world. That is what he called it. He said that Antarctica is the greatest weather factory in the world, that what happens there affects the weather of the entire Southern Hemisphere.

Now at this point, I invite the attention of Senators, to the fact that the Conference on Antarctica was convened on October 15, 1959. This, I think, is something of interest. The Conference on Antarctica was convened on October 15, 1959.

When do the Senators suppose it was concluded and signed?

It was signed by the participating nations on December 1, 6 weeks later.

I think that is an alltime speed record for the negotiation of a treaty with the Soviets.

Our representatives have been in Geneva for I do not know how long, negotiating with the Soviets in regard to disarmament and in regard to American civilians and American military personnel who are held in Communist prisons.

Our representatives have been working on those problems for 4 or 5 years.

In fact, in regard to almost every subject we can think of, our representatives have been trying to negotiate with the Communists. But the Communists drag those proceedings out interminably. That is one of their methods.

However, it took only 6 weeks to wrap up the Antarctic Treaty package. There was no trouble about it, and little wonder that there was not. The Soviets expressed no serious differences over the American proposals. On the contrary, they welcomed those proposals with open arms, and accepted them with the greatest alacrity. And why not? Did they ever get a bigger bonanza?

From the Soviet standpoint, the American initiative in proposing the Antarctic Treaty was a completely unexpected and unlooked-for bonanza.

I suppose the Soviets were astonished that our representatives would come forward with such a proposal.

It is little wonder that it took the Soviets only 6 weeks to say "yes" to it.

The only serious argument offered in favor of this gratuitous giveaway of American rights—which is what I believe it is—and I do not believe in using softer language when harsh terms are more accurate—is that, somehow, it would further the cause of coexistence; that, somehow, this strange arrangement would make the Soviet Union more amenable to compromise in Europe and elsewhere in the world.

I say this not without some basis in the record, for the report of the Foreign Relations Committee itself suggests that this is an argument in favor of ratification of the treaty. I now quote from the committee's report:

> While the risks of entering into agreements with Communist countries are not discounted, the committee subscribes to the belief that a breakdown in communications between the Communist bloc and the free world is an immeasurably greater risk. It believes it is in the interests of the United States to arrive at an agreement with the U.S.S.R. in an area where mutual interests appear to coincide rather than diverge. The alternative to this course of action seems to entail drawing Antarctica into the arena of global conflict. Furthermore, it is considered that this treaty could set a valuable precedent for dealing with new situations arising in the space age.

Mr. President, I like to be charitable when I make criticisms. To me, it is understandable that, prior to the Paris Conference, people of good intentions should have entertained such illusions on the subject of coexistence. But, for the life of me, I cannot understand how anyone could entertain such illusions now; I cannot understand how in the world anyone now could argue rationally that we should engage in such a course of conduct, after what we have gone through at the Paris Conference.

Under these circumstances, such a proposal is more than I can comprehend.

In the light of everything that has happened since May 16; in the light of Khrushchev's brutish disruption of the summit conference; in the light of the Japanese riots, which have horrified decent men and women all over the world; in the light of the Cuban situation, which by the hour grows more terrible for us and for freemen everywhere; in the light of the Soviet walkout from the disarmament conference within the matter of a few weeks; in the light of the blackmailing letters of recent date to our NATO allies; in the light of repeated threats of nuclear war over the U–2 incident, over the RB–47 incident, over the Cuban situation, over the Congo situation—and I would point out that it has been only a matter of hours since Russia has been menacing us again over the Congo—in the light of all these things, can it still seriously be argued that we, by ourselves displaying a conciliatory attitude toward the Communists, will encourage them to display a reciprocal attitude of conciliation? Mr. President, all logic and all sense refute such an argument.

On the contrary, Mr. President, it seems to me that it is now perfectly apparent—more apparent than ever before to all who have wished to have more facts in connection with this situation—that each new concession and each new display of weakness on our part encourages the Kremlin to further arrogance and further aggression.

Mr. President, this is the situation in which we find ourselves; and there are no facts to refute that assertion. On the contrary, all the evidence supports it. Yet we are asked to make further concessions, to demonstrate further our willingness to bend and to bow and to give in.

I am sure the Antarctic Treaty was conceived by men of good will as a demonstration of trust and good will and a desire to cooperate.

I am sure that is so; I have never thought otherwise.

In my own heart and mind I am confident that this attitude was developed during the time when many people in this country and elsewhere in the world thought that our difficulties were being resolved, and that the tensions, as they are described, were being relaxed, and that there was a chance that we could get away from all this trouble, worry, and strife.

I think that is the background of this proposal and the atmosphere in which it was conceived; I think that is how it came about. I understand that, and I am not critical of the men of good will and good intentions who at that time thought there was such a chance.

But, I suggest to them and to my colleagues, that at this hour it is apparent—so apparent that it is undeniable—that now there is no reasonable chance that such a condition will prevail in the world.

I always desire to be respectful of anyone who is the President of the United States, and I always wish to be respectful of any administration that is in charge of our country.

So I wish to say, most respectfully, to this administration: You now have every justification in the world for taking the stand, which I truly believe and urge you do take, and for saying, that the Soviet actions since the negotiation of this treaty—including the repeated threats of nuclear war, to which I have referred, four of them in 60 days—have made it necessary for the United States to reconsider its position.

If this administration, under the leadership of our President, took such a stand, and followed it up by calling for a conference of free world nations with records of activity in the Antarctic, I believe we would be doing what is right, I believe we would be making progress in the cause of freedom in the world, and I believe its position would be applauded by freemen everywhere.

I confess that I have been hoping, certainly since June, that the administration would make some such announcement.

Perhaps I was foolish, but I actually thought it would do so. In view of what has happened, I thought the President would probably make such an announcement and save us this struggle in the Senate. I prayed it would happen; but it has not happened, and that is why I have taken the time to urge, with all the vigor I can command and muster, that the Senate extricate the administration from the dilemma into which I think ignorance and good intentions have led it.

We can extricate it by refusing to ratify this treaty. That is what I hope we shall do.

I am one voice, and a small one, but I do not believe that our colleagues have had the time, because of the two great political conventions, and all else that has been going on, to delve into the subject. Oh, it would be a great pity if, through lack of a full understanding and a deep appreciation of all that is here involved, we were to rush headlong into this dreadful kind of agreement, which, tragically is an agreement in perpetuity. I hope we do not do so.

I have heard it suggested that perhaps it should be urged that we postpone consideration of this matter until January, when a new administration will come into office.

I do not have too much difficulty about that question.

I am not trying to beat a treaty.

This is not a personal conflict so far as I am concerned.

These are not adversary matters.

I do not get any pleasure out of arguing with my colleagues about subjects like this.

If it is wise to put the treaty over until the first of the year, until a new administration comes into office, that is satisfactory.

All I am suggesting is that we take a little time to think about it and to recast our decisions in light of world events.

Perhaps by January a great change will have taken place. I have never thought the situation was all hopeless. I earnestly and devoutly believe that some one of these days, in God's good time, a great change will come over the Communist world; and so long as we can keep the guns from speaking and so long as we can hold the peace, we ought to be working at it.

But I am afraid this treaty is not the way of peace.

It is surely not intended so, but I think it is the way of destruction and of war, because it will whet the appetites of aggressors in the world who are out to destroy freedom.

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DODD. Yes; I am glad to yield to a colleague who made a great and definitive speech on this subject, which I have carefully read, and who is well informed on this whole matter.

Mr. ENGLE. I thank my colleague. I address this question to him. I propose to make a motion, a little later this evening, that consideration of the question of ratification of the treaty be postponed until the 25th of January. My purpose in making that motion will be that the next President of the United States, the next Secretary of State of the United States, and the next Secretary of Defense of the United States, whichever party they may belong to, will be given an opportunity to look at a treaty that will affect, in perpetuity, for all practical purposes, the disposition of an area of the world bigger than the United States plus all of Europe.

I propose in all seriousness to make that motion tonight because I believe that the administration which will have the responsibility of the foreign affairs of this country for at least the next 4, and perhaps the next 8, years, and perhaps the next 20 years—we do not know—should have an opportunity to look at a treaty which so fundamentally affects the position of America throughout the world.

I am delighted to hear my distinguished friend say what he did, if I interpret his statement correctly. I wish to ask him if he thinks that is a sound motion, a good motion, and one that ought to be supported by this body?

Mr. DODD. Yes. I am very glad that my friend and colleague has asked the question, because if there is any doubt about my position or attitude, I want it made clear.

Of course, I agree.

I think if we had that much time, until January 25, as I think the Senator has suggested, to see how things go, to see how the aggressors in the world behave, and to consider our posture with respect to them, it would be wise.

There is a haste about this matter that appears unseemly—6 weeks of negotiations, followed by rushing this matter to the floor of the Senate when we have only just convened. I have learned to be careful about what one says around here. Some people take deep personal offense at what is said. But perhaps something else is involved. A civil rights amendment cannot be attached to a treaty.

In any event, I do not have the feeling that our colleagues have taken hold of this issue. I do not think our people have. The front pages of the newspapers are filled with pictures of the candidates and how we are acting with respect to them, but no one is talking about a treaty that may well affect the lives and fortunes of decency in the world for all time. So, of course, I would be for any postponement that would give us some time and some opportunity for further reflection.

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. DODD. Of course.

Mr. ENGLE. I appreciate the Senator's remarks, the fine speech he has made today, and the fine speech he previously made on this same subject.

I observed that the Senator called particular attention to article XII of the treaty.

Mr. DODD. Yes, I did.

Mr. ENGLE. Article XII provides, in part:

> The present Treaty may be modified or amended at any time by unanimous agreement of the Contracting Parties whose representatives are entitled to participate in the meetings provided for under Article IX.

Mr. DODD. Yes.

Mr. ENGLE. The treaty provides who are to be the participating parties. One is Soviet Russia.

Mr. DODD. Yes.

Mr. ENGLE. Does that not mean to the Senator that unless Soviet Russia consents, the treaty cannot, in its duration, be modified?

Mr. DODD. That is precisely correct.

Mr. ENGLE. Of course it does.

Mr. DODD. That is correct.

Mr. ENGLE. Let me read another section.

Mr. DODD. I interrupt the Senator to say that this is a typical veto power again reposed in the Soviet Union, which I think has an almost unbroken record of abuse of such power.

Mr. ENGLE. Of course. We are asked to create again a Security Council situation in which the Soviet Union by its unilateral voice can deny the will of all others.

Mr. DODD. That is right.

Mr. ENGLE. There are 12 parties to the treaty. Eleven of them could agree on a modification. I have a copy of the treaty in my hand. The 11 parties could agree, and the Soviet Union could veto the agreement.

Mr. DODD. That is correct.

Mr. ENGLE. Let me go one step further, to be sure the RECORD is clear. In article XI it is provided:

> If any dispute arises between two or more of the Contracting Parties concerning the interpretation or application of the present Treaty, those Contracting Parties shall consult among themselves with a view to having the dispute resolved by negotiation.

How well we remember the negotiation in Korea.

Mr. DODD. Yes.

Mr. ENGLE. In Warsaw.

Mr. DODD. It is still going on.

Mr. ENGLE. In Geneva, and in Paris.

Mr. DODD. The negotiations are still going on.

Mr. ENGLE. "Inquiry, mediation, conciliation, arbitration, judicial settlement, or other peaceful means of their own choice." It is not the choice of anyone else, but "their own choice."

Mr. DODD. Yes.

Mr. ENGLE. That means the treaty will exist in perpetuity.

Mr. DODD. Yes.

Mr. ENGLE. Unless the Soviet Union agrees to a modification.

Mr. DODD. Yes.

Mr. ENGLE. I have one other point. I ask the Senator if he agrees that the treaty provides that the effects and purposes of the treaty shall be forwarded by unanimity among the 12 signatories?

Mr. DODD. Yes; it does.

Mr. ENGLE. That raises another question.

Mr. DODD. It raises a very serious question.

Mr. ENGLE. Let me raise the question specifically. Let us assume that the Soviet Union undertakes to orbit a satellite in the Antarctic. We might say, "That is not a peaceful act, because it has a purpose of reconnaissance of the military installations throughout the free world." The Soviet Union might say, "Oh, all we are doing is looking at the moon, and it is not going to bother anybody."

A dispute would then arise between 2 of the 12 signatories—namely, the United States of America and the Soviet Union—as to whether the satellite which the Soviet Union orbited was in fact a peaceful satellite or was in fact a satellite with a military implication.

Who is to decide that question? Who is to decide the dispute? I will tell Senators who would decide it. It would be decided by "peaceful means of their own choice."

Mr. DODD. That is correct.

Mr. ENGLE. Oh, yes. We have been all through that. We went through it in Korea. We went through it in Warsaw. We went through it in Geneva, as to disarmament. We have been through it in Paris, and elsewhere.

What would the treaty do? It would invest the Soviet Union, which has no rights whatsoever in the Antarctic, with the right to veto the action of the 11 other signatories of the treaty. That is what it all amounts to.

Mr. DODD. Yes.

Mr. ENGLE. Antarctica is an area as big as the continental United States plus all of Europe.

I say that this is a matter which is very significant. The treaty provides for a 30-year duration, and beyond that, because it cannot be modified except by unanimous agreement.

Mr. DODD. There is no escape clause whatever.

Mr. ENGLE. None whatsoever. The great area would be subject to the veto of the Soviet Union. I cannot imagine the United States of America, with the experience we have had in the past few weeks, entering into a treaty of this sort.

I compliment the Senator for his great speech. I hope that the Senate will refuse to ratify the treaty.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I am deeply grateful for those comments.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DODD. I will yield in a moment to my distinguished friend from Louisiana.

Mr. President, I think I should say to the distinguished Senator from California that no one has made a greater contribution to the consideration of this matter than he has. It has been encouraging, and it has been great. My only fear is that not enough Senators have heard the Senator from California, and not enough people have had an opportunity to read his remarks. Perhaps this is an unfounded fear, and things will work out on the right side.

Mr. President, I now yield to a great and distinguished man, my colleague and friend the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I compliment the Senator upon an extremely learned explanation of this problem. I say to the Senator, as one member of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, that I did not have sufficient opportunity to study this subject. The Senator recalls that we had many committees meeting at the same time that the Senate was meeting, during the closing days of the session of Congress, prior to the holding of our great national conventions.

Mr. DODD. I know.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. As one member of the committee, it was impossible for me to attend the meeting of the committee as well as all the other meetings that were going on simultaneously.

I must say to the Senator that he has presented problems and has raised questions of which certainly this Senator had no knowledge whatever. One point which particularly impressed me about what the Senator has had to say is that the treaty was negotiated in 1959.

Mr. DODD. In 6 weeks.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. As I recall, that was a few weeks after Mr. Khrushchev was in America telling us how much he loved us.

Mr. DODD. Yes.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. He was not talking about blowing us up with rockets at that time.

Mr. DODD. No. All was sweetness and light then.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Someone at that time might have felt, "This is a good time to see if we cannot work with this fellow, and cooperate."

Since that time the Russians have really shown us the mailed fist, down to the simple basis that if we are not careful about what we do they are going to "blow us off the map."

Mr. DODD. That is correct.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. In the next day or so I believe the Russians will open the so-called spy trial in the case of the pilot, Powers, whom the Russians shot down.

Mr. DODD. Yes.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Which gave Mr. Khrushchev an excuse to wreck the summit conference and to rattle his rockets around the world.

Mr. DODD. Yes. There is no question about that. I will say, in response, that at this time I am deeply grateful to have the support of a man like the Senator from Louisiana.

In the Senate I suppose it can be said of us that we are inclined to be complimentary to each other and to preserve the complimentary formalities, but conscience compels and the truth requires that men speak frankly on occasions, particularly when they are moved by encouragement of the sort I have just received.

I honestly say to my friend, and to my colleagues, that I have never received a higher compliment since I have been a Member of this body than to have the thoughtful, reflective, considered support of the Senator from Louisiana on a matter of this kind. I am deeply grateful. I think ultimately the Senate itself will see the situation as he and I see it.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, I feel that the Senator is entitled to a much higher compliment than I am capable of bestowing upon him, with regard to the presentation he has made to the Senate. I simply wish to say, as one member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, that I was willing to have the treaty reported, but I was aware there was objection to its ratification. I think the basis of the objection certainly makes the case, and at a minimum we should postpone consideration of this matter until we have had a chance to think about it.

Mr. DODD. That is correct.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. That is the very minimum. The whole thing should be the basis of sober reflection and thought. After all, the Antarctic is a very big area.

Mr. DODD. It is vast in extent. It is bigger than the United States and Europe put together.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. It is a very substantial part of the entire globe.

Mr. DODD. Yes; it is.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. We may find ourselves in a situation somewhat like the Potsdam agreement. There was nothing wrong with the agreement, but the only trouble was that the other fellow did not keep his end of the bargain.

Mr. DODD. That is precisely the situation.

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I yield.

Mr. ENGLE. The trouble with the Potsdam agreement was that there was no automatic enforcement of it. The Soviets could violate it; the Soviets did violate it. Harry Truman made the statement that he would never again enter into an agreement with the Soviets, on the basis of their conduct on that agreement.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Can the Senator inform me as to the self-enforcing provisions of this agreement?

Mr. ENGLE. Yes; let us hear about them. What are they? There are none.

Mr. DODD. That is the answer, of course. This is one of my great complaints about the treaty. There are no self-enforcing provisions. There is no escape clause. There is no release clause. We would be caught in this agreement in perpetuity. I am sure a fair reading by any open-minded person, and particularly anyone trained to study legal terms, would lead to the inevitable conclusion that this treaty would in practice, be binding forever on us, and that we would remain in it unless we desired to get out of it by violation. This is why I said earlier that I find it difficult to comprehend the argument of my colleagues that it would be better for us to ratify the treaty, because we would be in a better legalistic position.

This argument is sophistry, I think. I do not mean that my colleagues were being intentionally evasive or deceptive, but rather I mean that they fell into error in that line of reasoning.

This is a harsh treaty, and it would bind us into a situation, once we get into it, from which we could extricate ourselves only by force, practically, by breaking it.

I am sure the Senator will agree, and other Senators who are here will agree, that this is contrary to the wishes and the intentions and the established habits of our people and all other free people in this world. We do not want to get into a situation that we can only get out of by violating some agreement. It is far better, I believe, to advise us not to get in to begin with, to wait a while, to take a look.

The Senator from Louisiana was reared in a State not unlike, in many respects, the one in which I was reared. The people of our States have a simple faith in words, and when one gives his word, he keeps it. When a nation gives its word in a treaty, it ought to be prepared to keep it, and we ought to know well in advance what kind of word it is that we must keep. That is what I do not think we are doing here.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Did not our present President, as well as President Truman, advise us that it would not be wise to make any agreement with the Communists unless the provisions were self-executing and self-enforcing?

Mr. DODD. Yes. That raises an interesting question which I have thought about. I wonder if my colleagues have thought about it also. It occurred to me the other night, thinking about this subject, that after a man has been in the Presidency from 4 to 8 years, he seems to become very knowledgeable about the threat of communism.

The present occupant of the White House, I say with great respect to him, for he is a great man, has learned the hard way from all the abuse and the terrible treatment to which he has been subjected. He knows now what it is all about if he did not know before. He knows now.

I have had the privilege of talking with former President Truman, as I am sure my colleagues have. He has told me time and again that we cannot trust the Russians for a minute. They will break their word every time it is in their interest to do so.

So, of course, the Senator is correct. This is one of the strange things about our times.

I am perplexed and intrigued that on all sides we are told that the Russians are people we cannot trust. They will break their word. They are out to destroy us. Yet all the time somebody is saying, "Let us have a new chance to do business with them." This is contrary to all human experience. It is contrary to all logic. It is contrary to all good sense. It is unprecedented folly. The experience of persons is the only experience worth anything, and the experience of nations is the experience of persons. If I or my colleague enters into an agreement with a man and he breaks his word, he abuses me, he tries to murder me, he tries to destroy me, is it sensible to suggest to me that I should enter into more agreements with him?

I only refer to this question in passing, but it is an oddity of our time, and I find myself perplexed and saying to myself, "Is there something wrong with my mind? Have I gone off the track somewhere? Is everything that I was taught changed in the world?"

I was brought up to believe that if a man lied to me and broke his word, I should not have anything more to do with him. One kept away from that kind of fellow, particularly if he tried to burn down one's house, shoot his wife, and murder his children. But now we have entered into a time when it has become a custom, a habit and a fashion to say, "Well, now, after all, you had better go back and do some more business with these people."

This is what I say is ailing us. How will we straighten ourselves out? I do not know the answer to that question. I wish I had the wisdom, the judgment, and the ability to know. But I do know, and I am confident that the great Senator from Louisiana knows, that the course that is suggested by this treaty would only lead us into more trouble, into more difficulty and into more problems.

So I join with the Senator from California [Mr. ENGLE] in urging our colleagues not to ratify this treaty. Let us wait at least until the new year, and at least until we have a new President, as has been suggested, whether he be of the Republican Party or of the Democratic Party. Both candidates are great Americans. They are devoted to this country. Give us some time. Do not rush us into this situation under the conditions in which we find ourselves.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. DODD. I yield.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. The Senator from Connecticut well knows, does he not, that the treaty is not binding upon nations that are not signatories?

Mr. DODD. Yes; I do.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. This Nation has no satellites that we could send down there to exploit the Antarctic. The Philippine Islands are not satellite to the United States. We gave that country complete independence. The South American nations are independent, and while they cooperate with us today, they are certainly not controlled by this Nation.

There are no nations on this earth that we can call upon to undertake risky enterprises because it might be to the interest or the advantage of the United States.

Is it not true that there are a number of Communist satellites—the Communist Chinese, the Poles, and many others—who under their national flag could even send Russians in?

Mr. DODD. Yes; there is Czechoslovakia.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. There are Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Bulgaria, Rumania—all nations that could send even Russians in under their own satellitic flag and proceed to mount missile bases.

Mr. DODD. Yes.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. And while we could not do it for ourselves, while we could not even put a tracking station down there to see where they were flying those missiles, we would not be in position to say they had violated the agreement?

Mr. DODD. Yes.

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DODD. I yield.

Mr. ENGLE. The Senator from Louisiana has made a very fine point. We have 12 nations in this treaty. There is 20 percent of the Antarctic area with respect to which no one has made any claims. Let us assume that the Soviet Union says to one of its satellites, "Go down into Antarctica and establish a missile base." Then what happens? The treaty provides that the 12 nations which have arrogated to themselves the responsibility for this area will collaborate to keep everybody else out. But what about the nation that comes upon the 20 percent of the area that is not the claimed area of any single nation?

Mr. DODD. What the Senator says is true.

Mr. ENGLE. Of course, the people of that nation will undertake their activities. Then the question will come up in a 12-nation conference, because the 12 nations will get together.

The Soviet Union will say, "We cannot quarrel with these people. They are in an area unclaimed by any nation on the face of the earth, and unclaimed by any signatory to this treaty." How can we argue against that?

What happens? They set up a missile base. They can send up a satellite missile and they can do anything they want to do. Under the treaty, what position are we in? The area is demilitarized. We cannot set up a base which will counteract a base set up by a Soviet satellite nation. Further than that, under the terms of the treaty, we are subject to inspection by the Soviet Union itself. The Soviet Union then inspects us to see to it that we are neither countering the base of their satellite country nor setting up a passive defensive system, to learn what is going on. Their satellite country proceeds to go about its business. Does anyone raise any question about it? If anyone does, the Soviet Union cites article XI and says, "We will negotiate with you."

Mr. President, they will negotiate with us, as they did in Korea, as they did in Warsaw, as they did in Geneva, and as they did in Paris, and as they have done in every other place when they have negotiated with us. They are willing and able to negotiate with us year in and year out. It is perfectly ridiculous. This is a stupid treaty. I hope the Senate will repudiate it.

Mr. DODD. The Senator from California knows that the Soviets go on and on, endlessly, negotiating every legitimate question with us. We are still negotiating with them in Geneva. We are still negotiating with them for the return of American civilians. I have a constituent in New Britain, John Downey, who has been in Communist China for 8 years. Our Ambassador and their Ambassador at Warsaw have been negotiating fruitlessly for 8 years.

How long did it take the Soviets to agree to this treaty? Six weeks, 42 days.

Mr. ENGLE. They knew that the treaty was to their advantage.

Mr. DODD. They knew what they were getting. They understood that what they were getting was what I described earlier as an incredible bonanza.

There is another reason why I oppose this treaty.

I think most Americans share my belief that Communist governments wherever they exist are criminal regimes, born in criminal actions and maintained only by force and terror. They can in no moral sense be considered legitimate governments entitled to the respected status which we accord the governments of the free world.

Because of the fact that Communist governments control a large portion of the earth's surface and people, because of the necessity to take all reasonable steps to avoid war, we have been compelled to accord many Communist regimes the diplomatic trappings of legitimacy and respectability. I assume that we have done so because our leaders felt that we had no alternative.

Must we now, however, bring Communist Russia into a new area of the world and feed its pretentions to legitimacy and prestige by according to it the same status and giving it the same rights that we give to lawful free world governments? To do so is to deny the fact that the Government of Russia is a criminal conspiracy which has no legitimate rights anywhere that decent men and women should honor. To do so is to help spread the disease of communism. To do so is to perpetuate the fallacy that a gangster regime is a lawful government.

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DODD. I should like to finish this point, if I may. We would be feeding the pretentions of communism to legitimacy. We would be giving it rights which should be extended only to legal, decent governments. Is that not what we would be doing in this case? If they are criminal and maintained by crime and are illegitimate, is there any reason for needlessly legitimizing their jurisdiction in a new area of the world in which they have had no status up to this time? It does not make any sense to me to do so, if the free world means what it says when it says that we cannot trust Communist governments, that they are criminal states, that they are tyrannical and brutal, and are controlled by terror and violence and crime. Under those circumstances, how can we face our fellows in the society of nations and urge them to enter into this kind of agreement? Have we not had enough? Do we want to spread the disease of communism even to the penguins? It is about time we thought of these things.

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DODD. I yield.

Mr. ENGLE. The Senator did not say so directly, but he did state it inferentially, and dealt with it in that manner, because in the draft of his speech this is what he said—and this is fine language:

> The report of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee argues that, "the treaty does not create a Soviet presence in Antarctica, but merely deals with an existing situation."

Then the Senator goes on to say:

> This, I am afraid, is a half truth, which completely circumvents the question.

Of course it does. What they are saying is simply, "Lie down and die, because they are there anyway."

Mr. DODD. That is correct.

Mr. ENGLE. Then the Senator goes on to say:

> If the claims of other nations and the rights of the United States in Antarctica have any validity at all, then the Soviet Union has been carrying on its International Geophysical Year at the bottom of the world on the basis of a kind of visitor's visa. The effect of the Antarctica Treaty is to grant the Soviet Union full citizenship, so to speak in perpetuity.

That is what the Senator said. He told the truth.

Mr. DODD. I believe so.

Mr. ENGLE. They are now hanging on in Antarctica by their eyebrows, by their eyelids, by their fingertips. On the basis of what the Committee on Foreign Relations has done, they are granted full citizenship in Antarctica, nullifying everything ever done by Adm. Richard E. Byrd and all the others, vacating our claims, and putting the Russians on an equal basis with us. In the Far West we would say we are dealing them in on a draw poker hand with no pairs. That is precisely what we are doing. I cannot vote for the treaty, and I will not vote for it.

Mr. DODD. I am happy to hear the Senator say so.

Mr. ENGLE. This is one of the most flagrant things that has ever happened to America.

Mr. DODD. I believe so.

I do not know whether the Senator from California was in the Chamber when I tried to point to what seems to me to be a situation of recurring frequency which is alarming. We are often confronted with situations, similar to the situation in which we find ourselves now, where we are constantly told, concerning Communist entry into new areas, "This is a fact. This is a realistic situation. Let us face up to it. We cannot change it except by war."

Anyone who rises to suggest another course of conduct is marked down usually as a warmonger, a fellow who wants to start a war, or as an utterly unrealistic person who will not face the facts. This is a habit of thought which has been growing in our midst.

Speaking without notes, and not from studied recollection, I think I may say that I do not recall a situation in my lifetime when we were faced with only those two alternatives. We are not so faced tonight. Our friends on the other side of the question urge us to ratify the treaty, and have been doing so over and over again.

We do not need to say, over and over again, how much we admire our colleagues. We do admire them. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. McGEE] is a very competent Senator. I read his speech carefully, because I was unable to be present when he delivered it. Time and again he stated that "the harsh fact is that the Soviets are there."

Mr. ENGLE. But they are not equal. Under the treaty, the Soviet Union would be made equal. Moreover, they would be given a veto over the 11 nations, 7 of which have legitimate claims and rights in Antarctica.

Mr. DODD. That also is true. I am glad the Senator from California has reminded me of that. The Soviet Union is in Antarctica on a visitor basis, so to speak. We are told that they moved in. I do not want to go into the whole history of the International Geophysical Year, how it got started, and how it ended up, where we are tonight. Nevertheless, I think we cannot escape the fact that it certainly must never have been comtemplated that once we invited them in they would stay forever. Yet that is what we are being told. We are being told that the Soviets are our guests in Antarctica and that we cannot get rid of them unless we want to punch them in the nose. Polite people do not do that, so we are told that we had better abide by the rules, get along with them somehow, and give them an equal status in the household.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield?

Mr. DODD. I yield.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. One point which concerns me is the submission of these questions to the International Court of Justice. The Communists live by a different standard of morals than we do.

Mr. DODD. The Senator is so right.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I have morality particularly in mind. According to their own pronouncements, those acts are moral which promote the spread of the Communist world of influence.

Mr. DODD. That is correct.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. In fact, that is their definition of "truth."

Mr. DODD. I am sure it is.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Truth is that statement which advances the spread of communism. Accordingly, by their standard, what we say is true would be a lie to them if it did not spread communism.

Mr. DODD. That is correct.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Based on their standard of morality, the meaning of the word "truth" is different to a Communist. It would be to their advantage, every step of the way, to be diffusing lies and deceptions under this agreement. This would give them an opportunity to take full advantage of us by lying and breaking the agreement, while at the same time attempting to hold us up to scorn.

The Senator will recall the charge which they made against us with respect to germ warfare in Korea. The United Nations proved that it was a canard. Nevertheless, it was necessary for us to go to great trouble to prove that the Communists had lied.

Under this treaty, no one can say how or where the Communists would victimize us, world without end, through the use of their satellites.

Mr. DODD. The Senator has raised an important point. The point I make may be considered extraneous, but it raises a question I find to be of great interest. I refer to the great controversy about the World Court. I was privileged at one time to be engaged as a lawyer before an international tribunal. I believe that some day—I hope the day will come soon—we can have a world situation in which there can be a true world court, a court in which disputes between nations can be resolved by judicial process. We all want this to take place. We pray for it and ardently hope for it.

I am certain in my own mind that one of the primary, fundamental conditions for such a situation, in a juridical sense, is that there be a common political denominator in such a court. It is not possible to have a court which is half Communist and half free, and expect to get any kind of decision from it which is worth the paper on which it is written. I find myself, at times, out of patience with good intentioned friends who say that all the problems in the world could be solved if we would simply agree to submit all our differences to a world court. That is not enough. It will have to be a world court constituted of men who have a common basis for their jurisprudence. This point is seldom discussed.

In a certain sense, in this country we have a federation of 50 States. What is the common political denominator? The Constitution guarantees to every member of the federation a republican form of government, so-called—and "republican" is spelled with a small "r."

I say that if there is to be a world court, and if it is ever expected to get any justice from such a court, there must be guaranteed a common juridical denomination. I believe that some day this will come about. However, great changes will have to take place in the world, and those changes will not occur by making concessions, by displaying weakness, by surrendering, by giving up values and rights which will preserve freedom. By doing this we will only increase the strength and the ability, in a sense, of the aggressor Communist forces in the world.

It seems to me that that is really another side of the question. It is a matter of grave concern in this whole consideration. I said earlier, and I suppose I have said it three or four times on the floor tonight, but I feel very deeply about it, that if the American people really understood the issues which are being debated here, I have no doubt how they would decide. But this is a difficult time. I think one of our tasks in the Senate is to have an issue of this kind thoroughly discussed and completely debated, so as to give the people of the country an opportunity to comprehend what is at issue and what is at stake. I know we have tried to do that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me, with the understanding that he will not lose the floor?

Mr. DODD. I yield to the Senator from Texas with that understanding.

PROGRAM FOR WEDNESDAY

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, many Senators are inquiring about our plans for the remainder of the evening. I should be glad to ask the Senate to remain in session until the distinguished Senator from Connecticut concludes his address and any other Senators, including the distinguished Senator from Kansas [Mr. CARLSON], who may desire to address the Senate, conclude their addresses.

In order that all Senators may be on notice as to when to expect a vote on the treaty, I should like to propose, after consulting with the distinguished minority leader and the distinguished senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], who desires to speak on the subject tomorrow, a unanimous-consent agreement: That is, that when the Senate concludes its deliberations today, it stand in recess until 9:30 o'clock tomorrow morning; that there be the regular morning hour; and that at the conclusion of the morning hour, there be not to exceed 3 hours of discussion on the treaty, 2 hours of which would be reserved for the senior Senator from Georgia, and 1 hour to be allotted to any of the proponents of the treaty who might desire to speak.

Under the proposed agreement, any Senator who wished to speak, pro or con, as he desired, could speak this evening; and any Senator could speak briefly in the morning hour tomorrow.

The senior Senator from Georgia expects to use about 2 hours for his speech and any questions or interruptions which may occur during his delivery. That would bring the time for the vote to approximately 1 o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. ENGLE. I desire to make a motion to postpone the final consideration of the treaty until January 25, 1961. Do I correctly assume that such a motion would be in order? I assume it would be, according to advice I have received from the Parliamentarian. I was trying to ascertain whether the unanimous-consent agreement would apply not only to the final action on the treaty but also to all motions relating to the treaty.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Would the Senator from California desire to have some time in connection with his motion?

Mr. ENGLE. I think 15 minutes on each side would be ample.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I will add 30 minutes to the request, and make the total time 3½ hours.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I want to be certain that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CARLSON], who is a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] may be assured that each of them will have 10 minutes. And I believe that perhaps 10 minutes should be reserved for the minority leader.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Very well; then we shall arrange for 4 hours.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JAVITS in the chair). Is there objection?

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, let me suggest that the Senator from California [Mr. ENGLE] might make his motion immediately at the conclusion of the morning hour, and then we could vote on the motion. If the motion were to carry, no further time for debate would be needed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I would have no objection to that.

Then, under the unanimous-consent agreement, following the morning hour, 30 minutes would be allotted in connection with the motion of the Senator from California [Mr. ENGLE], with 15 minutes thereof to be controlled by the proponent of the motion, the Senator from California, and 15 minutes to be controlled by the majority leader; and following the vote on that motion, there would be not to exceed 3½ hours for further debate on the treaty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the proposed unanimous-consent agreement? The Chair hears none; and it is so ordered.

The unanimous-consent agreement was subsequently reduced to writing, as follows:

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT

Ordered, That effective on Wednesday, August 10, 1960, after the conclusion of routine morning business, during the further consideration of the Antarctic Treaty (Ex. B, 86th Cong., 2d sess.), debate on a motion to be offered by the Senator from California [Mr. ENGLE] to postpone further consideration of the treaty until January 25, 1961, be limited to 30 minutes, to be equally divided and controlled by the Senator from California [Mr. ENGLE] and the majority leader: Provided, That in the event the motion fails to carry, further debate on the treaty shall be limited to 3½ hours, to be divided, as follows: 2 hours, to be controlled by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] and 1½ hours, to be controlled by the majority leader.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, the Senate will remain in session this evening for so long as may be necessary in order to suit the convenience and pleasure of Senators, but we do not expect any votes to be taken this evening.

MEETING OF FINANCE COMMITTEE DURING THE SESSION TOMORROW

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Finance Committee may meet during the session of the Senate tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I assume this has been cleared with my distinguished friend, the minority leader.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes; it is all right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE ANTARCTIC TREATY

The Senate resumed the consideration of Executive B (86th Cong., 2d sess.), the Antarctic Treaty, signed at Washington on December 1, 1959.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut has the floor.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does any other Senator now seek recognition?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, let me inquire whether other Senators desire to address the Senate at this time.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Mr. President, I desire to make a brief address on the pending issue.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia is recognized.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Mr. President, I shall vote against the pending Antarctic Treaty because, by its nature, it is certain to be bad for the United States, good for Russia, and contrary to the best interests of free nations in the world.

It would freeze into uselessness the hard-earned bases for U.S. claims on the polar continent, and leave the Russians free to overrun areas to which they have neither rightful nor earned access.

Ratification would legalize a dangerous and unjustifiable windfall for the Soviets, at the expense of the United States and seven other free nations which have legitimate bases for territorial claims.

This treaty proposes that 12 nations solely by virtue of participation in the recent International Geophysical Year shall determine for the indefinite future how this vast continent is to be used.

Among these 12 states is Russia, which never took any active interest on Antarctica until the Geophysical Year, when it squatted on territory claimed by Australia, and refused to leave when the year was over.

Since the recent development of this sudden interest, the Soviet Government has established five Red stations in Antarctica, without regard for the bases of claims already established by other nations.

The Soviets are bringing in their satellites, Poland and Czechoslovakia. They are mapping great portions of the continent. They have named and renamed more than 800 geographical locations.

And in support of these penetrating activities, the Soviets are operating numerous ships and icebreakers capable of conversion into support of military operations dangerous to the Southern Hemisphere.

Russia has no valid basis for a claim in Antarctica. On the other hand, the United States has more valid bases for territorial claims on the continent than does any other nation.

Why the U.S. State Department should initiate such a treaty is not adequately explained. The fact that the Soviets want its ratification should be warning enough as to whose interests would be served.

I am completely sympathetic with the wish that Antarctica could be used now for constructive scientific investigation and other peaceful purposes. But with Russia as a signatory, this treaty will hurt, not help.

We would be utterly foolish to think that the Kremlin would ever honor any of the utopian provisions of this proposal unless they could be used to serve Communist objectives.

Even from a cursory analysis of the 14 articles of the treaty, it is easy to see what lies ahead; and I cannot escape the conclusion that Senate consent had better be withheld.

Article I says Antarctica shall be used for peaceful purposes only; but military personnel and equipment would be allowed in support. There is little doubt as to how the Soviets would comply with this provision.

Article II says freedom of scientific investigation applied during the Geophysical Year shall continue. This would license the Soviets to roam the continent, unrestricted by interests and claims of others.

Article III says scientific information and personnel shall be freely exchanged. From experience, we have reason to expect that the Communists will take more than they give.

Article IV says the treaty would cause no nation to renounce existing claims; but no act under the treaty shall be used as basis for asserting, supporting or denying claims; and there shall be no new claims.

The practical effect of this over the years would be to erode the prior bases for claims by the United States and others who honor the treaty, and to strengthen the new positions of the Soviets, who would exploit it.

Article V says that, pending subsequent international agreements with applicable provisions, nuclear explosions and disposal of radioactive waste materials in Antarctica would be prohibited.

We have every reason to expect that Soviet Government compliance with such a treaty provision as this would depend upon its suitability to Communist purposes and convenience.

Article VI would fix the geographical limits covered by the treaty. They would extend south of latitude 60, including the ice shelves, but excluding the high seas.

Article VII says the contracting nations shall have the right of inspection of each other's ships, aircraft, stations, and so forth, and the right of inspection by overflight.

Antarctica is a difficult, isolated area of 6 million square miles. Perhaps the probable effectiveness of inspection there can best be measured by the fact that the Soviets are not objecting.

Article VIII says persons in the area would be subject only to the jurisdiction of the country of which they are nationals. No one would change this, but it raises questions as to effective treaty enforcement.

Article IX provides for meetings of the treaty parties for consideration of recommendations furthering the principles and objectives of the treaty, but their adoption would require unanimous approval.

Surely, in these international organizations, we must protect our sovereignty by some means such as the unanimous-consent requirement; but how can we expect anything but destructive veto from Russia?

Article X says that, consistent with the United Nations Charter, the contracting parties would undertake to see that no one engages in activity contrary to the principles and purposes of the treaty.

There are, of course, United Nations Charter provisions for all member nations to band together to put down aggressors. But we have seen the vast difference between agreeing to these things and getting them done.

Article XI says effort would be made to settle disputes among parties to the treaty by negotiation, mediation, arbitration, and so forth. The alternative would be submission to the International Court, if disputants consent.

Article XII provides that the treaty could be modified or amended at any time by unanimous consent, and that after 30 years it could be changed by majority vote.

Article XIII would open the treaty for accession, or admission, by any state which is a member of the United Nations, and any other nations unanimously invited to accede.

Article XIV would authorize translations and official depositories for copies of the treaty.

These are highminded words. But Joseph Stalin said such "words have no relation to deeds." The U.S. Department of State must know the Soviet attitude toward treaties is still unchanged.

Ratify this treaty and the Communists will reap immeasurable benefits to the irreparable loss of the United States and seven other nations—all of them bulwarks of the free world.

Involved with the United States as nations with substantial bases for Antarctic claims are Chile, Argentina, Great Britain, France, Norway, New Zealand, and Australia.

But the State Department was not satisfied to limit this Antarctic Treaty to nations with substantial bases for Antarctic claims. Such a treaty could have been founded on international law.

Instead, for reasons which seem best known to the Department, it brought in also Soviet Russia, the Union of South Africa, Japan, and Belgium, and gave Geophysical Year activities in the Antarctic as the reason.

The purposes of the Geophysical Year activities are not minimized, but under the theories and principles of international law they do not justify participation in a treaty such as this.

A State Department expert testified before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee that "freezing" claims and bases for claims in Antarctica for an indefinite period would preserve the status quo.

Preserving the status quo is a rare achievement in foreign relations even under good conditions. Where Communists are involved, to depend upon preservation of the status quo would be dangerously unrealistic.

Of course, the Soviets in recent years have claimed everything north of the South Pole on the grounds that a Russian naval officer, about 1820, sighted two islands off the Antarctic coast.

Actually, since that time the Russians paid no attention to the frozen continent until after the end of World War II, and they did not move in until the Geophysical Year opened the door.

The facts are that Russia has neither claims nor basis for claims in Antarctica, and therefore has no concern about the provision in the treaty which would preserve the status quo.

But Russia would be the treaty's principal beneficiary, because it would legalize her access to the whole continent for the reason that she participated in Antarctic activities of the International Geophysical Year.

On the other hand, it was an officer of the U.S. Navy who first identified Antarctica as a continent, in 1839, and American whalers and others had been going to the area since the turn of the 19th century.

The schedule of expeditions from the United States to Antarctica has been long and continual. Our explorations have covered nearly 80 percent of the continental land area. Our contributions have been great.

We have established solid bases for assertion of sovereign rights over important areas by every accepted standard, but for some unexplained reason the State Department has never asserted our legitimate claims.

Now the State Department, with the status quo provision in this proposed treaty, would preclude the possibility that the United States might ever assert its just claims in Antarctica.

And this is not all. The proposed treaty would legalize Soviet trespass and occupancy of these areas, which might well become some of the most economically and strategically important points in the world.

I urge the Senate to reject this request for consent to the Antarctic Treaty. Instead of giving away the bases for claims to sovereign rights, we should start acting in this matter like the sovereign nation we are.

We should immediately assert our own rights; encourage other friendly nations with legitimate claims to assert them; and assist them in working out any overlapping or conflicting jurisdictions.

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. ENGLE. I desire to commend and compliment the distinguished Senator from Virginia on a typically statesmanlike speech with reference to this issue. I say that because in the remarks which he has made he has refrained from any reference whatsoever to his distinguished brother, the late Admiral Richard E. Byrd, who, more than any other man, contributed to America's exploration and discovery in the Antarctic.

I think it is typical of the Senator from Virginia that, in his natural modesty and in the modesty that his family holds, in his prepared statement he did not even mention what his brother had done. I am perfectly sure that what his brother had done has not affected his views as a statesman and as an American as to what action this treaty should be accorded in the Senate.

But, Mr. President, I cannot refrain from saying that I knew Adm. Richard E. Byrd before I knew his distinguished brother who serves in the Senate, and whom I have come to know and respect and admire as a Member of this great body. Adm. Richard E. Byrd and I were close personal friends. We talked many times about Antarctica. I was interested in it a long time before this treaty came before the Senate of the United States.

I introduced legislation which would have preserved and put together and held in one place the documentary evidence, going back through all the years, including the efforts of Admiral Byrd and others, supporting American claims to American sovereignty in the Antarctic. As a member of the House Committee on Interior, and as chairman of that committee, I asserted it was the responsibility of the Secretary of the Interior to list those lands in the Antarctic as public lands of the United States and to include them in the inventory of the public property of this country. I was diverted from that objective by the State Department, which insisted that I would rock the boat and upset the amicable relationships that were occurring with reference to the International Geophysical Year. Notwithstanding that effort, on two separate occasions I introduced legislation to implement a program that would have put in legal form and in one depository the basic evidence of America's claims.

I was shocked to learn that the evidence of those claims was scattered throughout all of the archives; that they were buried in the history of all these great adventures; that in no single place in America could we find a repository of the bases of America's claims in the Antarctic.

Admiral Byrd, before he died, autographed for me every one of the books he had written on his great adventures, great discoveries, and great expeditions throughout this world, and today they are prized possessions in my personal library.

So I can say something about it, I think, that the Senator from Virginia would not feel free to say; and I assert it is my firm belief that if Admiral Byrd lived today he would not be for this treaty. I do not assert that those remarks should apply to the Senator from Virginia. I am saying that on my own and from my personal experience and my personal relationships with a man whom I revered and admired as the greatest explorer of modern times.

I am delighted that the Senator from Virginia has taken the floor tonight in a statesmanlike way, wholly unassociated with personal relationships which must affect his thinking in this matter, and regardless of how he feels about it personally, as a Senator, has stated he opposes ratification of the treaty. I am glad, too, that the Senator from Virginia has said there is an alternative to ratification of the treaty, and that it is an assertion of America's legitimate claims in the Antarctic.

The Soviets are there with no right at all. We have let them in on an equal basis. We have given them a veto over the seven nations which have legitimate claims, as well as our own. We have put them in a position to veto the concerted action of the other 11 nations which have signed the treaty.

In addition, we have put the Soviets in a position to prevent any modification of the treaty until they see fit to change it. We have put them in a position to undertake activities in the Antarctic which involve questionable moves and to assert that they are peaceful in nature, and then to be the judge of whether those actions are peaceful.

There is nothing in America's experience in recent years which justifies us in doing this.

I say further that in a matter which vitally affects a huge continent—the last one on earth, really, which is unexplored and uninhabited—we should not be pressured into a decision in this extraordinary session of the Congress of the United States. That is the reason I intend to make a motion to postpone consideration of the question so that the next President of the United States, the next Secretary of State, and the next Secretary of Defense will have an opportunity to review these grave questions which have been raised by men of great repute in the Senate, as to whether America's interests will be truly served by what is sought to be done today and tomorrow.

Again I compliment the distinguished Senator from Virginia, a man whom I have learned to respect, to admire, and to hold in deep affection, as I did his brother, for the fine, statesmanlike statement he has made tonight.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JAVITS in the chair). What is the pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I ask that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Hawaii.

EAST-WEST CULTURAL AND TECHNICAL INTERCHANGE CENTER

Mr. LONG of Hawaii. Mr. President, one of the most effective supporters of the East-West Cultural and Technical Interchange Center, since it was first proposed, has been Congressman D. S. SAUND, of California. His testimony in support of the project before the Senate Appropriations Subcommittee recently was based, in part, upon his personal knowledge and experience in the area of Asiatic-American relations. The Honolulu Advertiser, in an editorial entitled "Support for Center," on July 8, 1960, called attention to Congressman SAUND'S important testimony.

I ask unanimous consent that the editorial be printed at this point in the RECORD:

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SUPPORT FOR CENTER

India's strong ties with Britain have been cited as an example of why the United States should go all out for an East-West Center at the University of Hawaii.

California's Representative D. S. SAUND, a native of India, pointed the parallel in recent testimony before the Senate Appropriations Subcommittee.

(The subcommittee subsequently recommended an appropriation of $30 million for the Center.)

Most present-day leaders of India had rough experiences with the British in the days before Indian independence, Representative SAUND said. Some of them spent long periods in jail.

Despite this, these Indian leaders feel close to the British today. The reason: they were educated in England.

"We can accomplish the same result through the proposed East-West Center," the Congressman said.

Speaking on the heels of a tour of Asia and Africa, Representative SAUND said: "I am firmly convinced in my own mind that there is going to be no resolving of the issues between the free world and the Communist leaders as long as the leaders of international communism believe that they can win the peoples of Asia and Africa to their side."

But as he pointed out, there is much ignorance of the United States in Asia and Africa and likewise a complacent indifference among Americans to what other peoples think about them.

In Japan, Representative SAUND said he found many Japanese who think of every American as a millionaire. In India he found many people who could not believe—because of Little Rock—that there is not segregation in every State.

"It is high time that we do something to win the hearts and minds of the teeming millions of people who live on the continents of Asia and Africa," Representative SAUND said.

That's what the East-West Center is intended to do—what it will be able to do most effectively if the full $30 million appropriation goes through when Congress reconvenes.

The support of enlightened men like Representative SAUND has brought the center close to realization and will enable Hawaii to play its full part in the service of the Nation.

SOVIETS' EAST-WEST CENTER

Mr. LONG of Hawaii. Mr. President, earlier this year, when the Congress was considering the establishment of an East-West Center in Hawaii, I called the attention of the Senate to the creation by Russia of a University of Friendship of Peoples. The Moscow institution seeks, in its own manner, to attract students from abroad so that they may be educated within the ideological framework of the Soviet system.

A brief report on the progress of the Russian university has recently been made by Dr. Benjamin Fine and printed in the Honolulu Advertiser for August 4. I ask unanimous consent that the article be reprinted at this point in the RECORD, and hope that it will give fresh reminder of the urgency of getting into operation our own East-West Center, authorized by the Mutual Security Act of 1960.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SOVIETS AHEAD IN TRAINING RACE

(By Dr. Benjamin Fine)

Soviet Russia has completed plans for its most ambitious effort to lure students from abroad—its unique, tuition-free Peoples' Friendship University. It is scheduled to open October 1 and will cater to students from Latin America, Africa, and Asia. Applications for admission closed July 31.

Although the entering class is limited to 500 students, many times that number have applied, according to Soviet officials.

Prof. Sergei Rumyantsev, former Deputy Minister of Higher and Specialized Secondary Education of the U.S.S.R., has been appointed rector of Friendship University. A special admissions committee has been formed to go over the many applications. Final selections are to be made by September 1.

To be housed in Moscow University, the new institution for foreign students has been organized under the auspices of the Soviet-Afro-Asian Solidarity Committee, the Union of Soviet Societies of Friendship and Cultural Relations with Foreign Countries and the All-Union Central Council of the Trade Unions.

Most programs will be 4 years, with the exception of medicine, which will take 5. Training is to be free. Moreover, the Soviet will provide maintenance grants, free medical aid, hotel accommodations, and pay for the travel to and from Moscow. Every possible inducement is offered to make the foreign students want to come.

If some of the students are not quite qualified to enter Friendship University, they will get special help. A preparatory faculty is being formed to help students brush up on their academic work, and remove subject deficiencies. Foreign students may attend these remedial or preparatory courses up to 3 years.

The language barrier may prove to be a real one in many instances. Since all work will take place in Russian, and not many students outside the Soviet speak or write this language, this handicap could prove serious. The Soviets have thought of this, too.

All students will have 1 year of study in the Russian language, under specialists. It is hoped by the officials that at the end of the year, the foreign students will master enough of this difficult language to be able to attend lectures and do the necessary laboratory work.

According to Soviet plans, this will truly be an international university. The Soviets, through the Ministry of Higher and Specialized Education and the Committee of Youth Organizations of the U.S.S.R., have invited eminent scientists and scholars from various countries of the world, but particularly Asia, Africa, and Latin America, to serve on the faculty and participate in the building of this university.

Six separate departments or faculties as they are called have been established. They are:

1. Engineering: Emphasis will be placed upon building and operation of machines and mechanical devices, construction, prospecting, extraction and use of valuable minerals.

2. Agriculture: Emphasis upon agronomy and animal husbandry.

3. Medicine: Medicinal treatment and pharmaceutics.

4. Physics, mathematics and natural sciences: The emphasis will be on math, physics, chemistry and biology.

5. History and philology: Here the stress will be on history, literature and the Russian language.

6. Economics and law: The emphasis will be on planning of the natural economy and international law.

To make it easier for foreign students, the examinations for admission may take place in their own countries. Or, if the students wish, the exams may be taken at Moscow University.

Within 5 years, the Soviet officials have announced, the Friendship University will admit from 3,000 to 4,000 students. This will be a costly venture, as all expenses will be paid for by the Soviets. And it will also jam the existing higher educational facilities, already over-crowded beyond capacity.

But from the Soviet point of view this is a good investment in future relationships with other nations, particularly the underdeveloped ones in Asia, Africa and Latin America.

In a sense, this is the Soviets' own Marshall plan. By training engineers, economists, government leaders and scientists, Moscow, in a short time, will have thousands of Soviet-oriented men and women in high places in many parts of the world.

LARAMIE, WYO.—LYKES BROS. STEAMSHIP CO. SERIES ON CITIES OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. McGEE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. McGEE. I wish to call attention to an article in a private publication entitled "Fleet Flashes" published by Lykes Bros. Steamship Co. It is another in their series of articles on cities of the United States. This particular article happens to be on my hometown of Laramie.

I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LARAMIE, WYO.

Laramie. It's a name that sounds off like a cowboy's whoop. The association is perfectly natural. Cowboys and cattle are a colorful part of this Wyoming city's past—and the occupation and industry still flourish in the area. Cattle is the agricultural mainstay in Albany County, of which Laramie is the seat. But with all the flesh-and-blood horses that have galloped the Laramie Plains, it was the iron horse that put Laramie on the map. Its founding can be traced directly to the building of the Union Pacific Railroad. Union Pacific engineers platted the townsite in 1868. Along with its part in Laramie's past, the railroad has traveled progressively through the years to continue today as a vital factor in the city's economy.

Another tremendous impetus to Laramie's present economic as well as cultural status in the State and the Nation was the establishment there 73 years ago of the University of Wyoming. Growing steadily in enrollment (now about 3,000 students during the regular academic year), plant facilities (47 buildings) and stature, its importance has increased in the same manner. Serving as the cultural and educational center of the State, the university maintains three principal functions—teaching, research, and service.

The University of Wyoming is comprised of eight colleges—liberal arts, agriculture, education, engineering, commerce and industry, pharmacy, law, and a graduate school. Training is offered in more than 400 specialized vocations. It also features the coolest summer school in America, with students coming from across the United States and from other countries to enjoy both the educational advantages and vacation features.

Among the major industrial plants are the Monolith Portland Midwest Co., which utilizes many of the local natural resources for the manufacture of cement and also produces sodium aluminate, a water purifier; the Forest Products Treating Co., one of the country's largest plants for treating ties, poles, and timber, the raw material coming from the nearby Medicine Bow National Forest, and the Great Western Aggregates, Inc., which produces expanded shale lightweight aggregates from local shale for use in concrete construction. The area also has oil wells and other mineral deposits being worked.

The Petroleum and Oil-Shale Experiment Station of the U.S. Bureau of Mines is located on the University of Wyoming's campus. This installation ranks as one of the most completely equipped experiment stations west of the Mississippi River, and is perhaps the largest in the world devoted to research of synthetic liquid fuels made from oil shale.

Sheep raising, while not nearly as large as it was several years back, is still a factor in the agricultural activity around Laramie. The rest of the agricultural picture is completed by dairy and poultry farms, and the raising of several crops, with hay—that part of the harvest which is not needed within the county for cattle feed—being the main cash crop.

This, then, is Laramie, Wyo., today—with a population of approximately 20,000, a modern elementary and high school system, up-to-date public library, churches representing almost every religious faith, and a council-manager form of government.

What is now Laramie was part of that fabulous Louisiana Purchase real estate deal in 1803 when Thomas Jefferson bought from Napoleon 885,000 square miles of territory for $15 million.

Credited with being the first white man to appear on the scene was a French-Canadian trapper named Jacques La Ramie. You guessed it—he's the man they named the place for, a name that was also attached to plains, rivers, fort, county, peak, and mountains.

Indians were plentiful in the area in those early days. Blackfoot, Cheyenne, and Arapahoe and Sioux tribes were attracted by the fine timber in the region and the buffalo herds that used the Laramie Plains for their summer range.

Ben Holladay, the stagecoach king, started routing his westward-bound wagons through that territory in 1862, and it was reported that by 1864 some 18,000 emigrants had passed through.

Permanent settlement of the area began in earnest with the arrival of the Union Pacific. Because of good water, the railroad chose Laramie for a main division point and by 1880 railroad employment there had reached 400.

The first territorial legislature located the penitentiary in Laramie, and it was remarked that "probably no town in the West at that time stood in greater need for such an institution."

Laramie's first attempt at city government was a failure, the rough element in town forcing its resignation. This wild group ruled unchecked until a vigilance committee was formed to restore order. Their steps were directly to the point—the bad guys who weren't hanged were chased out of town.

The population took a drastic drop, but the solid citizens who remained rolled up their sleeves and soberly laid the foundations for healthy growth. Progress was rapid after a real municipal government was set up in 1874. The Federal census in 1880 recorded the city's population as 2,696.

Ten years before this—in 1870—Laramie had attracted international attention with its first woman jury. This was the original attempt anywhere at women's suffrage. The female jurors earned the praise of Federal judges for their zealous devotion to duty.

In recalling influential persons in Laramie's past, a fellow by the name of Bill Nye is always put high on the list. It was in Laramie, during 1876 to 1883, that he established his reputation as a humorist. Before long "Bill Nye of Laramie" was just about the best known comic writer and lecturer in the United States. Because his fame was always associated with Laramie, the nationwide publicity was priceless.

Gifted by nature with breathtaking mountains, some 800 miles of fishing streams and a hundred lakes teeming with trout, it's not surprising that many tourists are drawn to the area. Elk, deer, antelope, and bear can be hunted with gun or camera, or you can hike through the fascinating surroundings or simply loll around and enjoy the scenery. Numerous free picnic and camping grounds are available, and there are modern hotels and fine tourist courts.

Snowy Range, one of the most beautiful recreation areas in the United States, is but 35 minutes from Laramie. Pole Mountain ski course is only 20 minutes away.

In July there is the annual jubilee and horse races and world champion steer roping contest. And in October there is the square dance festival.

Then, of course, the university is a big attraction to visitors, whether it be from the viewpoint of a tour of the beautiful campus or a good seat when their nationally recognized football and basketball teams are in action. Always strong contenders in the Skyline Conference, their nickname, as you might guess, is "Cowboys."

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Improving the Outlook for Small Business

OF
HON. ALEXANDER WILEY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, August 9, 1960

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, in the weeks ahead, we will be hearing a great deal about what the major political parties—both Democratic and Republican—propose to do for the American people.

Naturally, it is important that Government—guided by its administrating officials—do what is necessary to keep the wheels of progress moving forward.

At the same time, however, it is important that we vigilantly maintain a climate of maximum freedom in which the people have opportunity to do all that they can for themselves.

We recognize, of course, that maintaining a strong economy is an important part of our job. The strengthening of our job-creating, free-enterprise system, is fundamental to our economy. Today, there are more than 4.6 million businesses in the country. About 95 percent of these are small businesses.

Recently, I was privileged to discuss over Wisconsin radio stations the opportunity for further improving the small business outlook.

At this time, I ask unanimous consent to have excerpts of my remarks printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR WILEY

The Nation—to combat communism, spur progress, and promote peace—must assure a strong economy. A few of the necessary steps include: Maintaining a sound, noninflationary, money policy—neither too tight nor too loose; plugging loopholes in the tax system; finding new ways to help job-creating business—particularly small ones—to progress; brightening the trade outlook, including efforts to expand exports; and—at the same time—to protect the domestic economy from the adverse impact of imports; encourage greater cooperation between the consumer, business, labor, and government—not only to combat inflation but to promote maximum progress.

FREE ENTERPRISE UNDERGIRDS ECONOMY

We recognize, of course, that our job-creating, free-enterprise system is the foundation of our economy. Throughout the country, there are about 4.6 million firms in business. This is an alltime record; 95 percent of these are small enterprises.

In addition to turning out our "arsenal of defense," these businesses and industries provide our people with the jobs, and goods and services necessary for better living, and for economic progress.

Currently, our output of goods and services—termed the gross national product—has reached an alltime high of over $500 billion. In addition, the gross national income has zoomed to more than $400 billion annually.

Unfortunately, it is difficult to relate these gigantic figures to the economic problems in the daily lives of each of us. However, the steady upward climb of national wealth does reflect meaningfully that the economy as a whole is going forward promisingly.

The fundamental task is to provide a climate of opportunity—for each of us—to reap a proportionate share of the Nation's wealth. This is true for farmers, professionals, businessmen, and folks in all other walks of life.

ROLE OF SMALL BUSINESS IN ECONOMY

On the main streets of America, small business—including more than 110,000 in Wisconsin—in the villages, towns, and cities, are the wellsprings of our economic life. However, further efforts are needed to improve the outlook. Although there are many ways it may be done, any major program, I believe, should include:

1. Providing an opportunity for greater participation in Federal defense and defense procurement programs.

2. Establishment of local development companies to provide financing funds for small businesses—in areas where other adequate financing sources are not available.

3. Efforts by States—as well as small businesses, themselves, to cooperate in providing managerial and technical assistance to small business for resolving problems, improving efficiency, and other tasks that may be too expensive for the small business budget.

4. Further improving the patent system for protection of ideas and systems.

5. Expansion of research providing management aids through voluntary groups and—as necessary—through State and Federal assistance programs.

6. Encouraging labor—management peace, or conversely, preventing strife to minimize costs of labor-management difficulties. Fundamentally, their interests are mutual—not conflicting.

DEVELOPMENT OF SMALL BUSINESS "POOLS"

The development of small business "pools" also is helping to meet some problems that could not otherwise be resolved, such as:

Collect market and research information related to a particular industry for dissemination to participating members;

Construct, acquire, or establish laboratories and other facilities for the conduct of research;

Prosecute applications for patents and render patent services for participating members; as well as Negotiate and grant licenses under patents held under joint programs.

TAX OUTLOOK

Taxes for individuals as well as business of course, are always a serious matter.

What is the outlook?

As things look now, the great pressures on Uncle Sam's pocketbook—particularly for defense, as well as domestic programs, threaten to increase, rather than diminish.

Consequently, the outlook for immediate, across-the-board tax cuts is dim. However, this would be a good time, I believe, to undertake what has long been needed—and that is, a top-to-bottom overhaul of the tax system.

For this purpose, I have introduced legislation to establish a Hoover-type tax commission. The purpose would be to plug loopholes, iron out inequities, eliminate unintended hardships or benefits, capture revenue that now may be escaping taxation; and make adjustments in the tax structure to reflect the changing needs of the economy, the technological revolution, shifts in the pattern of consumer and national requirements—and other purposes.

In a free enterprise system, it is absolutely essential that tax laws be formulated to encourage—not limit—economic growth and expansion. In addition, there is a need for simplifying tax reporting—particularly for businesses as well as individuals.

Despite the fact that taxes have been at a substantially high rate, ranging up to 91 percent, however, the economy has progressed in the last 8 years; for example, the gross national product, as I mentioned, has increased 35 percent.

EXPANDING FOREIGN TRADE

There are, of course, opportunities for improving the outlook for job-creating business and industry through expanding trade.

Traditionally, the U.S. market has been the major target for the products of our factories as well as farms. With further improvement of our mass production techniques—for stepping up production—however, we need to look for new horizons. Currently, for example, studies are under way by the Department of Commerce to see what new opportunity exists in the export field. As of now, only a minor portion of firms in Wisconsin—and the United States—have engaged in foreign commerce.

Around the world, however, there are many potential markets. The less-developed countries of Latin America, Africa, and Asia, particularly, offer real prospects for new business opportunity. In effect, they need everything.

How can we take advantage of the emerging opportunities?

First, we need to broaden our horizons; to attempt to find new markets.

Second, expand U.S. and Wisconsin participation in international trade fairs, offering opportunity to locate customers.

Third, utilize services of Department of Commerce—as well as cooperate with other business—to locate and attempt to supply new markets.

PROBLEMS IN EXPORTING

We recognize, of course, that there are difficulties. These include:

Financing the necessary market research.

Competing with goods produced at lower wages and operating costs from other countries.

Acquiring the financing as well as developing the know-how for entering and profiting by participation in foreign trade.

Difficulty of converting foreign currency—earnings or principal—into U.S. dollars.

Problems of complying with national laws as well as local ordinances affecting distribution of goods in other countries; and

Running the risks of expropriation or even confiscation of property in unstable countries where such investments are necessary for market outlets.

Currently, the United States is negotiating with other countries to attempt to resolve a number of these problems. This would mean not only greater health for business and industry, but more jobs for the workers in America.

IMPACT OF IMPORTS

We recognize that trade is a two-way street. Unfortunately, a number of Wisconsin and U.S. firms are now suffering from the impact of imports. We cannot ignore this situation. Instead, a realistic effort must be made to protect U.S. industries—and their workers—from being too hard hit by imports—often produced by lower wage levels and operating expenses.

Recently, I joined in cosponsoring legislation to establish a special committee to study the impact of imports on domestic industries. The purpose would be—by a clear and objective study and survey by competent persons—to determine the necessary steps to provide protection for domestic industries. Also the committee would see what could be done by enterprising exploration and official negotiations to improve the opportunity for new markets in other countries.

After the recess, I believe that Congress should take speedy action to set up this committee. In the interests of the overall economy, we cannot too long endure losses by domestic firms—which affects not only firms but our workers and the overall economy.

CONCLUSION

This, then, is a brief review of a few of the problems involved in further strengthening our economy.

Again, I want to stress that, as one sector advances, the whole economy is benefited; conversely, as any segment suffers, so does the whole economy—not only in terms of loss of business and industrial activity, but in jobs for the workers of the country.

Needed: New Study To Expand Trade and Commerce Through St. Lawrence Seaway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALEXANDER WILEY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, August 9, 1960

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, the St. Lawrence Seaway—completed in 1959—offers new, untested opportunity for expanded trade and commerce. The challenge now is to take full advantage of the great potential.

As a sponsor of the original Seaway law, Public Law 358, of the 83d Congress, I am particularly concerned with assuring that (a) the Seaway fulfills its full potential in terms of market opportunity for Wisconsin, and the great agricultural-industrial complex of the upper Midwest; and (b) that it pays off the costs of operation and construction—a $140 million investment by the American people.

A comprehensive review, and exploitation of, the potential is absolutely essential—if the Seaway is to fulfill these objectives.

Recently, I contacted the Secretary of Commerce to urge that a comprehensive study be undertaken by the Department of Commerce aiming toward improving and expanding trade and commerce through the St. Lawrence Seaway. I ask unanimous consent to have the text of my letter to Secretary Mueller urging such a study printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I am writing to respectfully urge that a comprehensive study be undertaken by the Department of Commerce, aimed toward improving and expanding trade and commerce through the St. Lawrence Seaway.

As you well appreciate, the Seaway, completed in 1959, offers new commercial opportunities for the agricultural-industrial complex of the upper Midwest—the greatest in the world and the whole Nation.

The challenge, now, is to take full advantage of these new opportunities.

We recognize, of course, that the search for markets, rerouting of trade, changing of trade patterns—these, and other complex innovations—cannot be done overnight.

However, I believe that a comprehensive study—covering the whole scope of possibilities for expanding trade, commerce, and tourist traffic, through the Seaway, would help tremendously in benefiting the economy, providing new opportunities for the farms and factories of America to transport their products to new markets; strengthen and improve trade relations with other countries; assure that tolls from the operation of the Seaway—as provided by law—will support the costs of operation, as well as pay off the debt of construction.

Naturally, you are in the best position to determine the scope of such a study. In my humble opinion, however, I believe that any such survey should cover such fields as: A review of potential markets for U.S.-produced products, transportable through the Seaway; providing information on the Seaway to foreign and domestic shippers; encouraging a greater flow of tourists, to, and through, the Seaway; explore for new ways and means to increase interest in utilizing the Seaway by shippers and producers, as well as consumers abroad and elsewhere in the United States.

As we recall, the Grace Line recently received permission from the Maritime Board to withdraw its vessels from the Great Lakes-Caribbean service route. Generally, I believe this marks a setback for Seaway traffic—at a time when it should be expanding in an uninterrupted way.

In carrying out such a study, it would appear that the services of the St. Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation, itself, as well as your own Department—could make invaluable contributions to providing data and information—and perhaps new trade policy recommendations—to assure maximum utilization of the potential of the St. Lawrence Seaway.

I sincerely hope, therefore, that you will find it possible to initiate such a study in the near future.

Sincerely,

ALEXANDER WILEY.

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 10, 1960

(Legislative day of Tuesday, August 9, 1960)

The Senate met in executive session at 9:30 o'clock a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the Vice President.

Rev. Gordon Powell, M.A., B.D., minister, St. Stephen's Presbyterian Church, Sydney, Australia, offered the following prayer:

So long Thy power hath blessed us, sure it still will lead us on, O God.

Remembering that our decisions this day could affect the lives of millions of people right round the world, we turn to Thee for wisdom to know what is right, courage to do it, and perseverance to continue to the end.

Take from our souls the strain and stress, and let our ordered lives confess the beauty of Thy peace.

Help us to pray more and worry less, to remember that worry paralyzes thinking and consumes our resources. Set us free from fear that distorts the truth, warps the judgment, and weakens the will.

In a moment of silent prayer we would pause to realize Thy presence, and hand over to Thee our burdens of spirit, mind, and body—all anxiety and sorrow, all sin and guilt and fear, all tension. We relax in the Lord, we let go and let God.

We thank Thee for Thy peace, O God; for this inner spiritual peace and for freedom from war.

We thank Thee, our Father, for the small nations which in days of war were preserved by the strength and sacrifice of the United States, and we thank Thee for all the nations which have been given hope and courage through the difficult years.

May this great Nation ever be the champion of the weak and the oppressed, holding aloft the beacon of liberty and faith, ever finding true greatness not in the selfish use of power and possessions, but in the dedication of its power and possessions to the building of a better world for all.

When days are dark, steady us with the faith that the Lord reigneth. This is Thy universe and Thou art working Thy purpose out. May Thy kingdom come because of us and not in spite of us.

So, O God, we thank Thee for the opportunity to serve Thee in this place. We believe Thou wilt grant the grace that is sufficient for our every need; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. JOHNSON of Texas, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday, August 9, 1960, was dispensed with.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the Senate by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

REPORT ON ACTIVITIES UNDER PUBLIC LAW 480, 83D CONGRESS—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

To the Congress of the United States:

I am transmitting herewith the 12th semiannual report on activities carried on under Public Law 480, 83d Congress, as amended, outlining operations under the act during the period January 1 through June 30, 1960.

DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, August 10, 1960.

TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE BUSINESS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, as in legislative session, there be the usual morning hour for the introduction of bills and the transaction of routine business; and I ask unanimous consent that statements in connection therewith be limited to 3 minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, reserving the right to object——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. May I have the attention of the minority leader?

Mr. RUSSELL. I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry. In the event that the request is agreed to unanimously by the Senate and we adopt this program for the morning hour, if a bill were introduced and a motion were made to instruct a committee with reference to that bill, would debate on that motion be limited to 3 minutes?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion would not be in order until the bill had been read the second time.

Mr. RUSSELL. It would not be in order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion would not be in order until the bill had been read the second time.

Mr. RUSSELL. So that no motion to instruct the committee could be made in the morning hour if proper objection were made to the second reading of the bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct. The only motion that would be in order at this time would be for the first reading of the bill.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, with that ruling of the Chair, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered, and morning business is in order.

A REPORT ENTITLED "THE INSURANCE INDUSTRY—AVIATION, OCEAN MARINE, AND STATE REGULATION" (S. REPT. NO. 1834)

I ask unanimous consent that the report, together with the individual views, be printed, with illustrations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wyoming? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

END RADIO-TV PAYOLA TO CONGRESSMEN—AMENDMENTS

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, in June of this year the Federal Communications Commission disclosed that an examiner had justified the award of a television channel in Albany, N.Y., in part on the grounds that it cannot be ignored that some of the stockholders are Members of the House of Representatives. This was found to give the firm an edge in the area of civic participation, one of the yardsticks used by the FCC in deciding contested cases.

On June 20 I said on the floor of the Senate that this policy is as morally wrong as it can be, that it sets up a firm pattern for predictable corruption, because it means that Congressmen who pass on all appropriations, including those for the salaries and expenses of members of the Federal Communications Commission, who determine every aspect of the basic law under which they are given the charter to operate and who, in the Senate, confirm or reject the appointment of all Commissioners—enjoy a special compensation when it comes time for the Commissioners to hand out these enormously valuable radio and television franchises worth in some cases millions of dollars. This is political payola at its worst.

The following day the Chairman of the FCC, Mr. Ford, phoned me to ask for an appointment. He came to my office to see me, and while he denied that in the Albany case the presence of Congressmen among the stockholders of the successful applicant was a deciding factor, he said that in his judgment it was not decisive because the Congressmen owned only a relatively insignificant fraction of the applicant's stock. Chairman Ford conceded that if the ownership by Congressmen is substantial, then indeed such congressional ownership is a favorable factor in the civic participation criterion. Incidentally, Chairman Ford explained that he had disqualified himself from this particular case and therefore was not discussing it ex parte.

Mr. President, since I protested this favoritism for those of us in Congress who have such decisive influence over every aspect of the FCC and the identity of the men who make it up, I have received a large number of letters and personal calls from all over the country from people in the television and radio industry who wholeheartedly agree that Congress should end this self-serving payola promptly. The only objections I have heard have been based on the misapprehension that I would prohibit Members of Congress from owning any interest in radio or television, which is, of course, untrue.

Mr. President, it is perfectly obvious that the Federal Communications Commission, especially in view of the clearly expressed attitude of its Chairman, is not going to change this policy by itself, or on the basis of a few protesting voices raised in Congress. We in Congress benefit from this immoral, payola policy of our own creature, the FCC. It is up to us to end it. We know in fact that unless we act it will not be ended. Can any Senator imagine the FCC, dependent as it is on this body, changing this policy so favorable to Senators and Congressmen in the absence of action by the Congress? Of course not. Silence by the Congress means the Congress is insisting on continuing the payola payoff to itself in enjoying this favored, privileged advantage in the award of rich radio and TV franchises.

For this reason, Mr. President, I submit at this time amendments to prohibit the FCC from considering as a favorable criterion in awarding radio or TV franchises, membership in Congress by any of the stockholders of an applicant.

Mr. President, I am offering this proposal as an amendment to an appropriate and pertinent bill now on the calendar, dealing with hearings before the FCC, S. 1734.

Mr. President, I ask that this amendment be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

FAIR LABOR STANDARDS AMENDMENTS OF 1960—AMENDMENTS

Mr. GOLDWATER submitted amendments, intended to be proposed by him, to the bill (S. 3758) to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, to provide coverage for employees of large enterprises engaged in retail trade or service and of other employers engaged in activities affecting commerce, to increase the minimum wage under the act to $1.25 an hour, and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware (for himself and Mr. FREAR) submitted an amendment, intended to be proposed by them, jointly, to Senate bill 3758, supra, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. STENNIS submitted amendments, intended to be proposed by him, to Senate bill 3758, supra, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

RELIEF OF DOMESTIC CARPET INDUSTRY—ADDITIONAL COSPONSOR OF CONCURRENT RESOLUTION

Under authority of the order of the Senate of July 2, 1960, the name of Mr. SCOTT was added as an additional cosponsor of the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 113) expressing the sense of Congress in favor of granting relief to the domestic carpet industry, submitted by Mr. THURMOND on July 2, 1960.

ADDRESSES, EDITORIALS, ARTICLES, ETC., PRINTED IN THE RECORD

On request, and by unanimous consent, addresses, editorials, articles, etc., were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. WILEY:

Excerpts of address delivered by him over radio station WIND, Chicago, Ill.

SENATOR JOHNSON'S ESCHEWING OF SECTIONAL APPEAL

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, on Monday, August 8, there appeared an article in the Washington Evening Star entitled "JOHNSON'S 'Kickoff' at Nashville," written by Mr. Ralph McGill, the first paragraph of which reads as follows:

No more bold or intellectually honest statement will be made in the presidential campaign than that by LYNDON JOHNSON in what was described as his "kickoff speech" at Nashville, Tenn.

In that speech the distinguished majority leader said:

I am not here as a Texan speaking to Tennesseans. I come as an American—to speak to my fellow Americans.

That is a point that I want to make unmistakably clear.

Wherever I go, I will never speak as a southerner to southerners or as a Protestant to Protestants or as a white to whites.

I will speak only as an American to Americans—whatever their region or their religion or their race.

I ask unanimous consent that the article by Mr. McGill be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JOHNSON'S "KICKOFF" AT NASHVILLE—SENATOR APPLAUDED FOR ESCHEWING SECTIONAL APPEAL, EMPHASIZING UNION

No more bold or intellectually honest statement will be made in the presidential campaign than that by LYNDON JOHNSON in what was described as his "kickoff speech" at Nashville, Tenn.

He was in the South. He was in a State ravaged by a campaign in which racial demagogs were in full cry. He knows there are some who strongly dislike the civil rights plank in the Democratic platform. He is aware others are withdrawn because Senator KENNEDY is a member of the Roman Communion of the Christian Church. Some 8,000 persons were before him, perhaps a fourth of them hostile.

For a moment at least, the devil may have taken him high on the mountain top of expediency and suggested the rewards of temporizing. If so, that devil was pushed firmly aside. Senator JOHNSON said:

"I am not here as a Texan speaking to Tennesseans. I come as an American—to speak to my fellow Americans.

"That is a point that I want to make unmistakably clear.

"Wherever I go, I will never speak as a southerner to southerners or as a Protestant to Protestants or as a white to whites.

"I will speak only as an American to Americans—whatever their region or their religion or their race."

Here was a clear, honest appeal to all those in the South who are reluctant or embittered to lay aside its bitterness and rejoin the Union in spirit. He spoke to them in the words of Andrew Jackson, whose stately home, the Hermitage, stands only 10 miles from where the Senator spoke and whose name and integrity are a part of Tennessee's heritage:

"Without union, our independence and liberty would never have been achieved; without union, they can never be maintained."

Senator JOHNSON went as directly to the issue of KENNEDY'S religious faith. "He (KENNEDY) wears no man's collar," he said, with deliberate, slow emphasis. "He will represent all the people."

It is important that, first of all, we see each other as Americans, since, until we do that, we cannot speak to one another as citizens of our endangered Nation.

This country guarantees freedom of religion and speech. But it is certainly not an American practice to condemn a man such as Senator KENNEDY, who has answered every question put to him on the subject of what conflict there would be between his religion and his oath. He has said there would be none; that his oath to defend all that is in the Constitution would be kept. Let us admit that it is just as damaging to the country to speak as Protestant to Protestant as it is Catholic to Catholic.

Senator JOHNSON was speaking, also, to those northern liberals who cynically said, after Los Angeles, that he would speak softly from one side of the platform while Senator KENNEDY stood on it. They would, the cynics predicted, work both sides of the street. Senator JOHNSON effectively has killed that charge.

He was saying, too, that the South must somehow provide its trapped leaders, even though they are largely responsible for their own predicament, with opinions which will enable them to lead the South into the national purpose.

Surely we know now we cannot abolish education, and thus deprive them of an equal chance in life. Surely we know that our waning political strength is not enough. Five or six States cannot dominate 45 or 44. We cannot live apart. We cannot any more defend discrimination than the southerners could defend slavery.

Old Hickory's text is true as gospel.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the Milwaukee Journal of August 8, relating to the same subject.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AS AN AMERICAN TO AMERICANS

The opening campaign speech of Senator LYNDON JOHNSON, Democratic candidate for Vice President, has attracted increasing attention and praise. Not the attacks on the Republicans, adequately noted at the time, but the somewhat ignored "declaration of principle."

Ralph McGill, Atlanta, Ga., publisher and columnist, has said that "no more bold or intellectually honest statement will be made in the campaign." Columnist William S. White has called it "a clear challenge flung into the teeth of regional conservatives and ultraconservatives everywhere below the Potomac."

The setting was Nashville, in Tennessee, a border State where southern sentiments run strong. The State was torn at the moment by a torrid senatorial campaign in which reaction and racism had joined forces against Senator ESTES KEFAUVER. JOHNSON faced an audience, part of which strongly disliked the 1960 Democratic platform and its civil rights plank, part of which was not happy about the Catholic religion of the party's presidential candidate, Senator KENNEDY.

It would have been simple for Senator JOHNSON to temporize, to hide the divisive issues with platitudes, to take the path of expediency, as northern liberals predicted he would do after Los Angeles. They joked that JOHNSON would speak softly from one side of the Democratic platform while Senator KENNEDY stood on it.

JOHNSON declared that he stood squarely on the Democratic platform, civil rights planks, liberal planks and all. He said that a man's religion had no place in an American political campaign.

He said, deliberately and firmly:

"I am not here as a Texan speaking to Tennesseans. I come as an American—to speak to my fellow Americans. That is a point I want to make unmistakably clear. Wherever I go, I will never speak as a southerner to southerners or as a Protestant to Protestants or as a white to whites. I will speak only as an American to Americans—whatever their region or their religion or their race."

It was a clear, honest call, as McGill wrote, to "all those in the South who are reluctant or embittered to lay aside their bitterness and rejoin the Union in spirit." JOHNSON quoted to his Tennessee audience the words of Andrew Jackson, whose home, the Hermitage, stood but 10 miles away:

"Without union, our independence and liberty would never have been achieved; without union, they can never be maintained."

FEDERAL COURT AT SALINA, KANS.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, the Bar Association of Northwest Kansas at their recent meeting adopted a resolution urging the construction of Federal court facilities at Salina, Kans.

The Salina Junior Chamber of Commerce at their board meeting on July 27, 1960, adopted a resolution in this regard, and I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SALINA, KANS., JUNIOR CHAMBER OF COMMERCE RESOLUTION

Whereas there are more than a quarter of a million people living in northwest Kansas who are not served by any Federal court facility nearer than Topeka, Kans., or Wichita, Kans.; and

Whereas the laws of the United States provide for a term of Federal court to be held at Salina, Kans., but Salina has remained without any Federal court facilities; and

Whereas the lack of a Federal court in Salina, Kans., subjects the people of northwest Kansas to undue, unfair, and burdensome expenses in the handling of their affairs in Federal court; and

Whereas the need for Federal court facilities at Salina, Kans., is continuously growing more acute; and

Whereas Salina is the most rapidly growing city in the State of Kansas of comparable size, and is now the fourth largest city in Kansas; and

Whereas the post office building at Salina, Kans., was originally designed to carry additional floors, in which Federal court facilities could be constructed; and

Whereas the Bar Association of Northwest Kansas, at its annual meetings in 1958 and in 1960, adopted resolutions to urge the immediate creation and establishment of Federal court facilities at Salina, Kans.; and

Whereas the amount of litigation in the U.S. District Court for the District of Kansas has increased to the point where the two Federal district judges in Kansas are unnecessarily burdened; and

Whereas there is pending in the Congress of the United States legislation for the creation of a third Federal judgeship for the district of Kansas: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the board of directors of the Salina Junior Chamber of Commerce, Salina, Kans., in its regular meeting assembled this 27th day of July 1960:

1. This board urges each of the U.S. Senators and U.S. Congressmen for the State of Kansas, and the Federal district judges for the district of Kansas, to do all in their power to cause appropriations to be made, plans to be prepared and construction to be accomplished for the establishment of Federal court facilities at Salina, Kans., and for the holding of regular terms of Federal court at Salina, Kans.

2. This board urges each of the U.S. Senators and U.S. Congressmen for the State of Kansas, and the Federal district judges for the district of Kansas, to do all in their power to cause adoption of legislation for the creation of a third Federal judgeship for the State of Kansas.

3. Each member of the Salina Junior Chamber of Commerce and every citizen of Salina, Kans., and of the northwest quarter of Kansas, is hereby urged to lend his full support and assistance to our Senators, Representatives, and Federal judges to accomplish the matters set forth in paragraphs 1 and 2 hereof.

It is hereby further resolved, That a copy of this resolution shall be transmitted to each of the U.S. Senators, Representatives, and Federal judges of the State of Kansas, and to each civic organization in the city of Salina, and to each junior chamber of commerce in the northwest quarter of Kansas.

CVI——1011

SOCIAL SECURITY RECIPIENT CANNOT MEET MEDICAL BILL EVEN WITH ADDITIONAL INCOME

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, a few days ago I received a wonderful letter from a man on social security. In the little work he has done in the past few years, he has had opportunity to talk to many of the elderly people of the State. He was so moved by these people that he wrote to tell of one of their greatest desires: The passage of a comprehensive medical care program.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the letter be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEAR SENATOR: I am on social security and I can realize how impossible it is for one to afford good medical care out of social security insurance. Although I receive social security payments, I work right along when I can get it. Even with this additional income, I cannot afford good medical care. A hospital room here costs $19 per day for room and three meals. I can get fine hotel accommodations here for $6, and I know very well I would not eat $11 worth of food a day.

I have been doing some advertising research which took me to a section of the city that seemed to be all old folks on pension, and their surrounding conditions were intolerable, both for Negroes and whites. I talked with them about medical care, and their hope was that the Forand bill would be passed when Congress returned to Washington in August.

Sincerely,

——— ———.

TAX MONEY WILL BE SAVED BY CONGRESSIONAL ACTION ON PADRE ISLAND NATIONAL PARK BILL THIS YEAR

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, in the interest of economy in Government, I strongly urge early action—both in committee and here on the Senate floor—on my proposal to establish a national seashore park on Padre Island.

The administration has gone on record favoring this project, and so have key Democratic leaders, including the distinguished Senate majority leader, my senior colleague, LYNDON JOHNSON, who has stated his wholehearted support of the plan.

Secretary of the Interior Seaton has recommended that this legislation be adopted at this session, and has promised to earmark $8 million for expenditures on the development within the next 5 years, if Congress will enact the bill at this session.

With the overwhelming support lined up for the project, a plan to preserve 88 miles of America's longest, southernmost open beach for public use it seems certain that a national recreation area will ultimately be set up on Padre Island. But there is a tendency in some quarters to put it off until next year. This is, in my judgment, a costly attitude and one which will inevitably result in the park costing more money than is necessary.

Each passing year, with private development of portions of the island, the remaining property which we need for public recreation facilities becomes more valuable. Consequently, it will cost more for the Government to secure it. I urge the Congress to act to establish the park on Padre Island this year so we can get this property while the price is relatively low.

I have already mentioned the fact that corporations are buying up large tracts of land on the island. Salesmen are going out across the country selling lots from these large tracts. All of this will mean that the price of the land will go up tremendously if the project is long delayed.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point a feature story concerning Padre Island, published in the Houston Post of July 24, 1960.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PADRE ISLAND IS GREAT NATURAL PLAYGROUND OF BEACH AND DUNES

Padre Island, one of a series of sandbars which parallel the Texas coast, stretches from the southernmost tip of Texas almost to Corpus Christi Bay, where it joins Mustang to make the world's longest island.

Here is one of America's great natural playgrounds—131 miles of surf and sand, beach, and dune, which—except for the three county parks and the fishing pier near the causeway—hardly bears the marks of civilization.

Only a few miles down the island, the visitor finds a scene of sky and sea and blowing grasses that seems hardly to have changed during the 25,000 years of the island's existence. Yet the peaceful beauty of Padre is deceptive, for during the past 400 years the island has been the scene of some of the most dramatic episodes of southwestern history. Gold-seeking Conquistadores and soul-seeking priests, rumrunners, blockade runners, slave-smugglers, and cowboys * * * pirates and soldiers * * * shipwrecked sailors and pioneer homesteaders—these and many more have lived, and often died, on the white sands of Padre Island.

The island itself is in a state of constant change, with the wind and the tides endlessly changing the topography of the sandbar, and with violent storms obliterating landmarks, and often uncovering an older page of its colorful history.

Even the island's name has changed many times. It was first charted as Isla Blanca, by early navigators in the gulf, and was variously called Isla de Corpus Christi, Isla de Santiago, and Isla de Malaguitas, before a Spanish priest Padre Nicolas Balli, took title to it in the early 19th century.

A persistent legend of buried treasure attaches itself to any island, and Padre is no exception, but the legend is reinforced from time to time when storms uncover ancient coins or other evidence of hidden treasures.

During the great years of her New World conquest, the Spaniards annually sent a great flotilla, loaded with treasure, back to the mother country, and, as their sailings often coincided with the hurricane season, millions of dollars worth of gold and jewels disappeared into the gulf. During the 1800's, authentic records tell of dozens of ships which went down in the vicinity of the island, many loaded with coins, bullion, and jewels.

For many years, Padre Island was the headquarters of smugglers, freebooters, and "sand pirates," who lured ships to their doom by showing false lights along the shore; but in the years before the Civil War, a more civilized form of endeavor found its place in the island history.

The original owner, Padre Niccolas Balli, founded a ranch and began cattle operations, and island cattle grew fat on the beach grass. In 1847, a three-masted schooner broke to pieces in the surf of southern Padre, and cast ashore an amazing family—Capt. John Singer and his wife, Johanna. From the wreckage of their ship, the Singers established a home, and there they lived, raised six children, established Las Cruces Ranch, and grew so prosperous that when they left the island in 1861, they buried a fortune of $62,000.

The island was occupied by Federal troops during the Civil War, and when the Singers returned after the war to recover their treasure, they found all markings wiped out by a storm. Only $2,000 of the Singer money has ever been found, but treasure seekers today are still looking for it.

During the 1870's a number of families lived and ranched on the northern part of the island, and a beef-packing factory operated near the pass for some years. It eventually was abandoned, and by 1900 the settlement had disappeared.

The "Duke of Padre Island," was Pat Dunn, who went to Padre in 1884 and established "El Rancho de Don Patricio." Although he sold his claim to the island in recent years, as he began to feel civilization moving in on him, he lived there until his death in 1935.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, the article points out that in 1847 a schooner broke up on the southern end of Padre Island and cast ashore an amazing family—Capt. John Singer, and his wife, Johanna. John Singer was the nephew of the man who invented the Singer sewing machine. They built a ranch there and became quite wealthy. When the Civil War broke out they buried $62,000 in gold on the island, which they had accumulated from their ranching operations up to 1861.

Subsequent hurricanes removed all but traces of the sizable buildings Singer had built, including a blacksmith shop. There are no buildings there now, except for a few which have been built in recent years, at each end of the island.

This is only one of the many historic events which have occurred on that island.

About $2,000 of the original $62,000 in gold hurriedly buried by the Singers have been dug up. Some vacationists might find the other $60,000, if we will only hurry and get the park established, and give persons a chance to roam around down there.

THE GRANTING OF PASSPORTS TO COMMUNISTS

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold the suggestion for a moment?

Mr. JAVITS. I am glad to do so.

Mr. LAUSCHE. There has been considerable discussion of what business should be taken up in this short session, and what subjects should not be taken up. I should like to express my view about certain bills pending before us which, in my opinion, are indispensable and essential for the security of our country, but upon which action has not been taken.

I speak specifically of bills which have been introduced to place in the Secretary of State adequate power to deny avowed Communists the right to travel from our country into Soviet countries.

Under the present status of the law, the Secretary of State is completely helpless in denying passports regardless of information he may have concerning Communist activities of those who seek passports. These bills have been pending for 2 years. They are now before the Committee on Foreign Relations.

One year ago hearings were conducted, and there was no opposition to the bills except from three groups. One of these groups was the Communist Party of the United States. Their representative stated at the hearing that these bills, which would give the Secretary of State the power to limit the issuance of passports to Communists, should not be passed.

The head of the Communists appeared before the Committee on Foreign Relations and stated that it would be an infringement upon the liberties which should be enjoyed by all Americans if our Government denied a Communist a passport to go to the Soviet Union.

In that same hearing another group appeared. That was a group of veterans, represented by one man. The organization has its principal office in New York. I probed that witness, to find out the number of members the organization had, the dues that were paid, the length of time of the existence of the organization, and so forth. There was a paucity of answers in regard to a showing that they were a group of veterans interested in the security of the United States.

In that same hearing, on the same morning, there appeared another agency. That one I will not identify at this time. It was unfortunate that these three organizations were grouped together. At any rate, the three organizations opposed the adoption of a bill which would give the Secretary of State the power to limit the issuance of passports.

Why do I raise this question today? Powers will be tried in the Soviet Union. Our country will be charged with practices of espionage which are improper. The Soviet Union will attempt to make it appear that it has conducted its inteligence activities in a manner which is described as proper. We are sending spies to the Soviet because of the absence of a law which I believe should be advocated.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LAUSCHE. I yield.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator means, I am sure, Soviet spies are being returned to the Soviet Union.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Yes; they are Communists, and every one of them is a potential spy. I will not stand idly by while we argue whether bill A or proposition B or subject C must be passed at this session, and while we slothfully and indifferently allow this condition on the issuance of passports to exist.

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LAUSCHE. I yield.

Mr. HRUSKA. Is the Senator from Ohio aware that there is pending at present on the calendar a bill dealing with the issuance of passports and the writing into the law—if the bill shall be enacted—of restrictions, power, and authority, in the hands of the Secretary of State, for the very purpose about which the Senator is speaking?

Mr. LAUSCHE. Which bill is it? What does it provide?

Mr. HRUSKA. It is a bill reported, not by the Committee on Foreign Relations, but by the Committee on the Judiciary. The Committee on the Judiciary deferred to the Committee on Foreign Relations for month after month after month; but in the absence of any action by the Committee on Foreign Relations, and in the closing days of the adjourned session, a bill, S. 2652, was reported by the Committee on the Judiciary. It is Calendar Order No. 1811. That bill contains the provisions to which the Senator from Ohio has referred as being highly desirable and long overdue.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I did not know of that. I know of several bills which are pending before the Committee on Foreign Relations. I know of a bill, substantially watered down, which was passed by the House, but which has not had the approval of our committee.

In any event, the Senator from Nebraska subscribes to the views which I am expressing, and I am glad to know that the Committee on the Judiciary is attempting to do something about the matter.

However, that still leaves a rather peculiar condition in existence, namely, that the Committee on the Judiciary has acted upon the matter, but the Committee on Foreign Relations has not.

Mr. HRUSKA. Two years ago, the Committee on the Judiciary sought to act on this matter. Nothing came of that action.

When the bill was introduced earlier at this session, it was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. A bill was also referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The Committee on the Judiciary deferred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, hoping that that committee would take action. It failed to do so. So the Committee on the Judiciary, of which I am a member, has reported the bill to which I have referred.

There is ample time in which to act on the bill. It should be acted upon. I associate myself with every bit of the thought and vigor which the Senator from Ohio has expressed on this subject. It is my hope that the bill will be taken up at this session.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, in my contemplation about a bill, I have completely in mind the necessity of conforming it to the declarations—right or wrong—made by the Supreme Court. I know of the disputes which exist as to whether the right to travel is an inherent, unalienable right which cannot be affected by Congress. However, a bill can be drawn which will remedy this indefensible situation.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield?

Mr. LAUSCHE. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I wish to associate myself with the Senator from Ohio in urging action on this proposal. As a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, I join in expressing regret that our committee has not acted prior to this time on this question. I do not believe it is too important which committee reports the bill. The Committee on the Judiciary has acted. I join with the Senator from Ohio in urging the leadership to bring this bill up, in order that the Senate may deal with this problem before we adjourn. Moreover, we should deal with it in time, since it is a Senate bill, so as to allow time for it to be considered by the House and receive favorable action in that body. There is no more important matter which can come before the Senate.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield?

Mr. LAUSCHE. I yield.

Mr. RUSSELL. I merely wish to express surprise that the distinguished Senator from Ohio should express any view as to the power of a sovereign nation to protect itself against proceedings of the kind he has outlined. The Senator from Ohio seemed to have some doubt about the power of Congress to legislate in this field. If there is anything fundamental in any government, it is that it has the power to take whatever steps are necessary to protect itself either from internal subversion or from attack from abroad.

I realize it is highly desirable that adequate standards and safeguards be provided to deal with the rights of American citizens to travel about the globe freely, wherever they might desire. But I do not accept the thesis that any American citizen has any inherent right, constitutional or otherwise, to undermine and overthrow this Government.

Mr. LAUSCHE. What I had in mind was the declaration by the Supreme Court, which might have been predicated upon the proposition that adequate standards were not contained in the law, under which, the Court held, the Secretary of State could not act; in other words, that Congress did not establish the latitude within which the Secretary of State could act by establishing a ceiling and a floor.

Mr. RUSSELL. I thank the Senator from Ohio. I wish also to associate myself with his expressed interest in legislation in this area. I cannot conceive of any more important matter to which the Senate should address itself than to closing this loophole which permits Communist agents to travel freely from this country to Russia, and return. They can take with them in their minds any information which otherwise they might not be able to transmit, to convey to the Soviet Government. They can travel to Russia to receive instructions which they probably could not receive in any other way than by going to Moscow and sitting at the feet of Mr. Khrushchev's agents.

It is inexplicable to me that Congress should delay for more than one day the taking of steps to rectify this situation.

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield?

Mr. LAUSCHE. I yield.

Mr. HRUSKA. It might interest the Senator from Georgia to know that in the testimony it was contended by many witnesses, during the course of the hearings, that there should be really no restriction on the constitutional and inherent right of American citizens to travel abroad. It is a far-fetched thesis. It is something which is not consistent with the history of passports and with the history of the American Government to control the travel of its citizens abroad, in view of the fact that when they do so, they are covered by the power, the majesty, and the protection of the American Government wherever they go.

In addition, of course, to the field of internal security, which is involved in that regard, the Committee on the Judiciary took jurisdiction of this matter.

It was contended by the Supreme Court, in its decision, that there were not sufficient guide lines; therefore, the bill was introduced incorporating not only the suggestions of the Department of State, but also, at the urging of the Department of Justice, particularly the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the bill provides guide lines. It provides for review by Congress, if anyone feels he has been shortchanged by reason of being denied a passport, when he has been charged with being associated with or being affiliated with the Communist Party, or knowingly has been engaged in activities intended to further the international Communist movement.

So the bill is in accordance with the views expressed by the Senator from Ohio. It remains only to be placed on the agenda and to be acted upon by the Senate itself.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, I yield to no one in my purpose to protect the liberties of United States citizens, liberties guaranteed by the Constitution. However, I shall not subscribe to a course of twisting those constitutional guarantees to the thin position where we shall endanger the security of our country.

It may be argued during the next month which bills are indispensable for passage. This item has not been mentioned. To me, this subject is as grave as any subject pending before the Senate. It is for that reason that I urge the Senate to take action on it at this session.

INVESTIGATORY SUBAGENCY FOR U.N. SECURITY COUNCIL

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, the United Nations, since its birth in 1945, has, I believe, established a commendable record of service in the interests of peace among nations.

In a fast-changing world, we recognize that as times and conditions change there will need to be modifications or refinements of the structure of the U.N. The purpose would be to deal more effectively with the variety of problems that are arising around the world.

Particularly, the Soviet Union's flagrant attempt to use the U.N. as a forum for propaganda to the world demands, I believe, the serious consideration of all people who do not want to see the U.N. so abused; and who are deeply concerned with further improvements of this international agency to enable it to deal with trouble spots that develop around the globe.

The false, ill-founded charges by the Soviet Union on the recent flight of the RB–47 plane and the attack upon it by the Soviet Union is a prime example—and probably a forerunner of further efforts of the Communists to use the U.N. to carry on its propoganda offensives.

Fortunately, on the RB–47 flight investigation, the United States came out far ahead. The deceptive tactics of the Soviet Union boomeranged—backing that nation into a corner of guilt from which there was no escape.

As a U.S. defense counsel, Ambassador Lodge did a beautiful job.

In the light of the stepped-up Soviet offensive of false charges, however, we can expect that there will be successive attempts—including other cases of outright lying—to attack the acts, policies, or prestige of the United States or other nations of the free world.

However, there is serious question as to whether the U.N.—faced with a great many serious world problems—should find it necessary to be "tied up" periodically by trumped-up charges.

Personally, I feel that the Security Council of the U.N. has more important things to do than act as a "clearing-house" for wild, reckless provocations by the Soviet Union.

The establishment of an impartial, investigatory subagency of the Security Council to conduct preliminary hearings such as held in the U.S. judicial system to determine whether this is adequate prima facie evidence to go ahead with a case, would handicap the efforts of the Soviet bloc to openly abuse the United Nations as a forum for their propagandizing; lessen the burden on the Security Council; enable the Council to direct its attention to more important and significant matters; eliminate, by preliminary, impartial investigation, the possibility of the United States, or any other nation, being subject to—and having to defend itself against—trumped-up charges in this world forum.

Even though the Soviet's refusal to submit to impartial investigation of the RB–47 case branded its charges as reckless, irresponsible, and outright lying, there is serious question as to whether rebuttal—no matter how effective—can really supplant, in the world's mind, the impact of the initial charge.

Overall, I believe that a "preliminary hearing" agency would serve to weed out the superficial, invalid charges brought to the U.N. Security Council, and enable that body to more constructively, effectively, and without unnecessary interruptions, carry on its more important objectives of attempting to establish order and peace in the world.

DEATH OF LELAND OLDS

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, last week the people of the United States lost a real champion and friend. I refer to the death of Leland Olds, who for a generation was, in truth, a public rights defender.

Mr. Olds held many public positions, first in the State of New York and next as a member and Chairman of the Federal Power Commission. He served the people of the Nation well throughout all those years.

He was one of the prime shapers of the St. Lawrence Seaway and power development. He supported expansion of rural electrification into the unserved areas of the Nation. He supported municipal power development. Because of his foresight and crusading efforts, the people of the United States have been assured of a more adequate supply of electric energy and a more equitable distribution of that energy and a more reasonable cost for that energy than they otherwise would have had. He always urged, and tried to impress upon the Nation, that this country requires a constantly increasing supply of electric power. Largely through his efforts, that necessary increase in our supply of power was developed.

He had his enemies, Mr. President. One of the charges they mentioned against him was that he was leading the country to socialism, through his support of public power, municipal power, and cooperative power. Mr. President, it is my opinion that through his efforts, exactly the opposite result was obtained, because through his efforts he was able to provide a degree of competition in the utility field, he actually slowed the trend toward Government ownership or Federal ownership of power distribution in the United States. Had it not been for his efforts in behalf of rural electrification and municipal power development, I am satisfied that the country would be farther along the road toward Government ownership and control of the electric utility business than it is today.

So, Mr. President, I wish to state on the floor of the Senate that I believe we owe to Leland Olds a debt of gratitude which was not paid, and may never be paid, but which I wish to acknowledge at this time.

To Mrs. Olds and family I extend my sincere sympathy and to the people of this country my regrets for the loss of an able and dedicated defender.

ENFORCEMENT OF CIVIL RIGHTS

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ALLOTT], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BEALL], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BUSH], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CASE], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER], the Senator from Hawaii [Mr. FONG], my colleague from New York [Mr. KEATING], the Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL], and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT], I introduce a bill to provide for the enforcement of civil rights, and for other purposes, which carries out—as I stated I would introduce it—the platform pledges of the Republican Party adopted at Chicago in 1960.

I ask that the bill lie at the desk, for additional sponsors, until Friday morning; and I ask that the second reading be deferred until Friday morning.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I have no objection to the Senator's introducing the bill, and I have no objection to its lying at the desk, for additional sponsors. But I would not agree, and could not agree, to any unanimous consent request which might imply that permission was given for the second reading on a day when there might not be an occasion for a second reading of the bill. We may not have a morning hour on Friday.

Although I have no objection to having the bill lie at the desk, for additional sponsors, I cannot consent to the unanimous-consent request in the form in which it has been presented at this time.

Mr. JAVITS. Then, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent only that the bill lie at the desk until Friday morning, for additional sponsors.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BURDICK in the chair). Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

The bill will be read the first time by its title.

The bill (S. 3829) to provide for the enforcement of civil rights, and for other purposes, was read the first time by its title.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I gather that there is no objection to that request.

Mr. RUSSELL. No, I have no objection to having the bill lie at the desk, for additional sponsors, for as long as the Senator from New York may desire.

Mr. JAVITS. Until Friday morning.

Mr. RUSSELL. But it probably will make some difference as to whether we have a morning hour on Friday, in light of the request which has been made.

Of course the Senator is wholly within his rights. But it seems that we are very likely to confine this adjourned session to the subject of civil rights, which did not loom very large in the picture at the time when the Senate recessed in July. I can see that that is a very sure way to kill any legislation in any other area. I am not enamored of some of the bills that are to be considered—the situs picketing bill, and so forth; and there are some of the provisions of the minimum wage bill to which I am opposed. But I think those bills are entitled to one little trial run in the Senate, before we tie up the Senate over an issue which occupied all our time and attention for some 9 weeks earlier in the year.

I serve notice again, Mr. President, that if this session is to be dedicated to the spuriously named political idol that so many persons call civil rights, some of us here stand ready, able, and willing to do our part to see to it that the Congress of the United States will have a right to consider legislation in areas other than this one.

AMENDMENT OF CLOTURE RULE

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I now send to the desk a resolution to amend rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate; the resolution is also a part of the Republican Party's 1960 platform. I submit the resolution on behalf of myself and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CASE], and request its appropriate reference. In this case I make the point that I request the appropriate reference of the resolution to a committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

The resolution (S. Res. 358) was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration, as follows:

Resolved, That subsection 3 of rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended to read as follows:

"3. If at any time, notwithstanding the provisions of rule II or rule VI or any other rule of the Senate, a motion, signed by sixteen Senators, to bring to a close the debate upon any measure, motion, or other matter pending before the Senate, or the unfinished business, is presented to the Senate pursuant to this subsection, the Presiding Officer shall at once state the motion to the Senate, and one hour after the Senate meets on the fifteenth calendar day thereafter (exclusive of Sundays and legal holidays), he shall lay the motion before the Senate and direct that the Secretary call the roll, and, upon the ascertainment that a quorum is present, the Presiding Officer shall, without further debate, submit to the Senate by a yea-and-nay vote the question:

" 'Is it the sense of the Senate that the debate shall be brought to a close?'

"And if that question shall be decided in the affirmative by a majority vote of the Senators duly chosen and sworn, then said measure, motion, or other matter pending before the Senate, or the unfinished business, shall be the unfinished business to the exclusion of all other business until disposed of.

"Thereafter no Senator shall be entitled to speak in all more than one hour on the measure, motion, or other matter pending before the Senate, or the unfinished business, the amendments thereto, and motions affecting the same, and it shall be the duty of the Presiding Officer to keep the time of each Senator who speaks. Except by unanimous consent, no amendment shall be in order after the vote to bring the debate to a close, unless the same has been presented and read prior to that time. No dilatory motion, or dilatory amendment, or amendment not germane shall be in order. Points of order, including questions of relevancy, and appeals from the decision of the Presiding Officer, shall be decided without debate."

ENFORCEMENT OF CIVIL RIGHTS—AMENDMENT OF CLOTURE RULE

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at this time I may proceed for 5 minutes in addition to the normal 3 minutes or 6 minutes, on these matters.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, let me ask whether the Senator intends to make any unanimous-consent requests in connection with his remarks or in connection with proposed legislation.

Mr. JAVITS. My purpose is solely to submit additional data.

Mr. RUSSELL. Then I have no objection, and would give the Senator all the time he wishes. I am a great believer in free and unlimited debate. I merely wish to know whether it is necessary for me to remain here in order to be able to object to any unanimous-consent request the Senator might propound.

Mr. JAVITS. I do not think so. I wish to talk with the Senator about my reason for deferring the second reading. But I shall do that later on.

Mr. RUSSELL. Very well.

Mr. JAVITS. I can only hope that my dear friends and colleagues who are opposed to civil rights legislation will limit their remarks in accordance with the time limitation I have just undertaken. In that event, we would not have so many problems.

Mr. President, the bill I have introduced today would, first, extend Federal financial assistance and technical aid to school districts and States seeking to desegregate their schools; second, establish a permanent Commission on Equal Job Opportunity among Government contractors; third, give the U.S. Attorney General the authority to bring actions for desegregation of schools in cases where physical or economic coercion is being used to deprive an individual of the constitutional right to attend a desegregated school; and, fourth, provide that completion of the sixth primary school grade is sufficient proof of literacy for voting purposes in Federal elections.

Also, I have submitted, on behalf of myself and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CASE], a resolution to modify Senate rule XXII. The need for such an amendment of that rule is recognized and called for in the Republican Party's 1960 platform, but is not specified in that plank in such detail that I could ask other Members of my party to join me in sponsoring the resolution in direct implemention of the platform.

The fact that 52 Democratic Senators yesterday voted against taking up even the two very moderate civil rights proposals requested in the President's message last Monday, and which are in both the 1960 Democratic and Republican Party platforms, when they were introduced by the Senate minority leader, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], does not mean that civil rights is a dead issue at this session of the Congress. I believe that there should be and will be other opportunities for Members of the Senate to endeavor to implement at least some portion of both parties' civil rights planks prior to adjournment this year.

Mr. President, whatever may be the charges and countercharges of the moment, I still believe that successful action on civil rights legislation is so deeply tied up with bipartisan sponsorship, that bipartisanship will yet reassert itself on this issue before we adjourn this year. It is my hope that that will be done.

It was my hope, even until yesterday, that some Democratic Senators who traditionally have joined Republican Senators in bipartisan action to bring about the enactment of meaningful civil rights legislation would join in sponsoring the bill I introduced this morning. Indeed, I introduced it as part of the Republican Party's 1960 platform. Therefore, I hope that other Republican Senators will join in sponsoring the bill. That is my reason for allowing the bill to remain upon the desk for 2 days, as a gesture of good faith, and with full respect for my colleagues, whatever may be our differences.

My reasons for introducing this bill implementing our platform at this time are these: First, the need for specifying in legislative form appropriate for enactment into law the platform of my party; second, to focus the attention of the country on the fact that what is blocking action on even moderate civil rights legislation is the filibuster, actual or threatened, which is made possible by the self-imposed restrictions placed upon the Senate's ability to control its own debate by rule XXII; third, that civil rights is now an issue of such magnitude, in terms of domestic tranquillity and the peace leadership of the United States, that it should be accorded equal priority with the other major measures dealing with health care for the aged, Federal aid for schools, housing, and minimum wage which are before us; and, fourth, that we are ready to act and a majority truly wants to act upon certain of these measures. I state that the urgency of action manifests itself by the deep feeling shown at home in the sit-in demonstrations in the South and abroad by the tremendous ferment of Africa now highlighted by the crisis over the Congo Republic.

I therefore suggested, in my analysis of the situation on Monday, that the Senate should at this short session enact the two civil rights items specified in the President's message—a statutory base for a Commission on Equal Job Opportunity on Government Contracts, and Federal financial and technical assistance to school districts seeking to desegregate—together with authority to the Attorney General to bring civil actions in representative school desegregation cases as the most moderate common denominator on this point in both platforms. Indeed, just about what was suggested by the leadership conference on civil rights.

I ask unanimous consent that the resolution of that conference may be made a part of my remarks at this point, together with a list of the conferees, representing some of the outstanding civic organizations of this country.

There being no objection, the resolution and list were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LEADERSHIP CONFERENCE ON CIVIL RIGHTS,
New York, N.Y., August 8, 1960.

STATEMENT ON CIVIL RIGHTS LEGISLATION IN THE AUGUST SESSION OF CONGRESS

As organizations dedicated to the advancement of civil rights in America, we call upon both political parties for assistance in the enactment of civil rights legislation at the reconvened August session of Congress.

Both parties have adopted strong civil rights planks with substantial areas of agreement between them. We ask both parties for an August downpayment on these planks as an earnest of their intention to execute the planks in full during the next administration.

While we shall press to obtain civil rights legislation at this session of Congress, we are equally determined to do everything possible to see that such legislation does not become a political football.

Civil rights bills must be handled sincerely on their own merits and not in such a way as to constitute a body block to consideration of other legislation before the Congress, as, for example, medical aid for the aged, housing, school construction, and minimum wages.

To the end that civil rights legislation may become a reality rather than a political pawn, we call upon Vice President NIXON and Senator KENNEDY to take this issue out of the partisan arena by agreeing upon a measure or measures which both parties can push to enactment along with other legislation at this short session.

We suggest that a basis for such an agreement lies in legislation proposed by both platforms upon which hearings have already been held by the Congress. As possible examples of such legislation, we suggest legislation which would—

1. Facilitate compliance with the Supreme Court's desegregation decisions by extending Federal aid and technical assistance to schools which in good faith attempt to desegregate.

2. Authorize the Attorney General to bring actions in Federal courts to protect constitutional rights.

3. Establish a statutory body to protect equal job opportunities on Government contracts.

It has been established over the years that neither party alone can deliver on civil rights promises. What is vital now is that the two candidates agree upon legislation which both will support actively in accordance with the pledges of their respective platforms.

We are confident that the necessary two-thirds can be mustered for cloture in the Senate if Vice President NIXON is determined to obtain the support of two-thirds of the Republicans and if Senator KENNEDY is determined to obtain the support of two-thirds of the Democrats (Southern Democrats represent substantially less than one-third of the total number of Senate Democrats).

As far as the House is concerned, the Rules Committee could hardly be a stumbling block if Speaker RAYBURN, acting for Senator KENNEDY, and Minority Leader HALLECK, acting for Vice President NIXON, jointly seek committee action.

On this road lies the possibility, even the probability, of civil rights legislation at this session of Congress and this can be accomplished without the excuse that to so act would hold up full consideration of other pending and needed legislation. A test of the good faith of the parties and of the presidential candidates will lie in their willingness to avoid partisan bickering over civil rights and to unite in the enactment of vitally needed civil rights legislation now.

Mr. JAVITS. As to other civil rights items, I suggested that we again—as in 1959—fix a date, so far as we are able to do so, at which they may be considered in the new Congress. I point out we did exactly that in 1959, and we went into extended debate on civil rights legislation on February 15, 1960.

The charge of politics has been leveled at those of us who seek some civil rights action at this session on the ground that it would block consideration of the other needed legislation I have specified. I yield to no one in my conviction that we should have legislation at this short session on these other items, but I point out also that the theory that they will be blocked by any civil rights bill only bears out the argument that we are wavering here under the threat of filibuster, expressed or implied, and that, notwithstanding the assurances of January 1959 of the majority leader, it is rule XXII which remains the real roadblock to civil rights legislation. And what we are seeing—and I say this advisedly, and I hope it will be answered—is, in effect, a confession by the majority, notwithstanding its topheavy number, that it cannot vote cloture under the existing rule XXII.

I would rather be accused of politics than of political cynicism, because I would not even try to do in civil rights what I sincerely believe is required by the national interest.

The Republican platform in its civil rights plank pledges "legislation to provide that the completion of six primary grades in a State-accredited school is conclusive evidence of literacy for voting purposes." Section 4 of my bill would carry out that pledge. The evidence that voting registrars have misused the literacy requirement to keep Negroes from voting in the South is abundant. Only recently, the U.S. Supreme Court handed down a decision, in the case of United States against Raines, which revealed the ridiculous extremes to which discriminatory voting practices can be carried. In finding for the plaintiff, its order should lead to the restoration on the voting rolls in an Alabama community of the names of several Negro teachers in Alabama schools, who graduated from Alabama colleges. These individuals had been declared unqualified to vote on the grounds that they could not meet the local literacy test.

In discussing this section of my bill, I would like to point out that its enactment would reduce the voting requirements in my own State of New York, where the completion of eight grades of schooling is a substitute for the literacy test. In other words, because I believe that the overall national interest would be served by such a provision—although it has a direct bearing on New York State—I shall do my utmost to seek its enactment, along with the other provisions in the bill. In 1950, the U.S. census reports that, out of nearly 88 million in the U.S. population over 25 years of age, an estimated 80 percent had finished 6 or more years of schooling. In 16 Southern States, 61 percent, or nearly 16 million people, aged 25 and over, could meet the literacy requirement for voting as outlined in this bill, according to 1950 census figures. Yet we all know that voting in Southern States is down to 20 percent or 25 percent of the population.

I should also like to emphasize that the provision I am submitting giving the Attorney General authority to start civil injunction suits is limited in the sense that it is directed to representative school desegregation cases. I have in the past, and will in the future, press for giving the Attorney General authority to bring suits or intervene in a case being brought by individuals charging denial of any constitutionally guaranteed right. However, this more limited provision is in my party's platform, and therefore should be accurately drawn in this bill to implement my party's civil rights plank, which is my purpose here. I have pressed for much broader authority than called for by the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, but this is certainly the most common denominator in both platforms, and hence I have offered in that way, in all good faith, to carry out the platform as written.

I am also introducing today, along with Senator CASE of New Jersey, the modification to rule XXII, heretofore cosponsored by Senator DOUGLAS, of Illinois, myself, and many other Democrats and Republicans, to prevent the filibuster or the threat of a filibuster from blocking civil rights or other appropriate legislation. It would give authority to the majority of the Senate to invoke cloture on the 16th day after filing of a cloture petition by 16 Senators, and would allow 100 hours of debate thereafter. Because the Republican platform called for a change in rule XXII, but did not specify it in more detail, Senator CASE of New Jersey and I have not sought widespread cosponsorship for this resolution among my Republican colleagues at this time.

However, this issue must again be raised at the opening of the session of the new Congress in 1961, which will occur a few weeks prior to the inauguration of a new administration. The revision of present rule XXII, which requires that cloture can be invoked only if two-thirds of those present and voting favor it—the modification presented by the majority leader as a compromise step in January 1959—is demanded now. It is demanded, as I have shown, by the fact that filibuster still remains the gun pointed at the heads of Senators who wish to vote for civil rights legislation, but who are equally interested in other legislation they consider vital to our Nation.

I emphasize again it is an admission that notwithstanding the topheavy number of the majority, with the addition of those on this side who are prepared to vote for cloture, and will, that they cannot or will not vote cloture which would enable us to enact even minimal civil rights legislation in this session.

I conclude by stating that the platform adopted in 1960 was described by a very distinguished newspaper as being a realistic program and, indeed, somewhat to be preferred over the Democratic Party platform.

I ask unanimous consent that the New York Times editorial of July 28, 1960, on that subject may be made a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE CIVIL RIGHTS PLANKS

The one plank that really caused a major battle at both conventions was the plank on civil rights; and in both cases the results have made history. It is a mark of the advance already achieved in public thinking about this question that both parties have so seriously addressed themselves to it and have felt it necessary at the cost of much bitter internal disagreement to come up with unmistakable commitments to carry out the spirit of the Constitution and to implement the moral basis of democratic government.

The Democrats adopted their civil rights plank in the teeth of intense opposition from their traditional stronghold in the South; the Republicans adopted theirs only at the insistence of Vice President NIXON—with Governor Rockefeller prominently in the background—and in the face of a real revolt. Of course, political calculations played a great part in the decision taken by both parties; but the fact that they made a politically expedient decision does not lessen the fact that it was also morally right.

The two planks bear a general resemblance to each other, but the Republican is on balance somewhat more realistic and more specific. Each stresses the need for equal opportunity to all Americans; each denounces discrimination; each supports enforcement of decisions of the Supreme Court; each emphasizes the importance of guaranteeing the right to vote, of desegregating the schools, of eliminating discrimination in employment and in federally financed public housing; each would extend Federal aid to school districts undertaking integration; each implicitly—though not explicitly—endorses the "sit-in" movement; each underlines the need for Federal leadership in the attack on racial bias.

But there are differences between the two planks, and some are important. On voting, the Democrats urge an end to literacy tests and vaguely propose further powers for the Attorney General if necessary. But the Republicans flatly advocate legislation to make 6 years of schooling "conclusive evidence of literacy for voting purposes," a more practicable suggestion.

On education, the Democrats ask for a desegregation plan from every affected school district by 1963, while the Republicans reject such a target date as a delaying tactic. The GOP would give the Attorney General power to initiate suits for school desegregation, while the Democrats would go further and extend the power to the whole field of civil rights. At present the Government can act initially only in voting cases.

On job opportunities in general it is the Republican platform that vaguely talks about eliminating discrimination, while the Democrats advocate a Federal Fair Employment Practices Commission. However, the Republicans make the important proposal (ignored by the Democrats) for legislation to end anti-Negro discrimination in labor unions "unless such practices are eradicated promptly by the labor unions themselves." The Republicans also oppose use of Federal funds "for the construction of segregated community facilities," a point the Democrats avoid.

Finally, the Democrats make no mention at all of the Senate rule that permits filibuster, which is the traditional device employed to block, retard, or defeat civil rights legislation. The Republicans pledge their best efforts to change the present rule and other congressional procedures that "often make unattainable proper legislative implementation of constitutional guarantees." If in the next Congress the Republicans actually throw in their strength with that of the Democratic liberals who have long been fighting to modify rule XXII, a major advance may yet be made in orderly and democratic government.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I have been glad to join in sponsoring this bill as an earnest of our determination to press for effective legislation in this field whenever possible.

It has been said that consideration of any civil rights legislation jeopardizes action on other important issues which require action at this session. But the fact is that, as the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights pointed out in its recent statement, action is possible if Members of both parties will put aside partisan considerations and work together for the enactment of measures to which both parties are pledged.

This fact is pointed up in the enclosed editorial from the New York Post of August 3. Fittingly the editorial commends Senator JAVITS for his unwavering efforts in behalf of civil rights. Over the years, first in the House, and now in the Senate, JACK JAVITS and I have worked together to assure equal treatment of all our citizens regardless of race or color. I ask unanimous consent that the editorial referred to be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE TEST IS BIPARTISAN

Senator JAVITS (Republican, New York) has rendered a conspicuous service by announcing that he will introduce legislation embodying key points of the Republican civil rights plank when the Senate reconvenes next week. His declaration gains added weight from his pledge to seek a Democratic cosponsor for his bills.

JAVITS is not simply proposing a partisan formula for embarrassing the Democrats with a futile gesture. He is presenting a challenge to the leaders and candidates of both parties.

The precise details of the course JAVITS has chosen are open to review and debate if and when he finds a Democratic partner. We should like to see someone like Senator HUMPHREY as his associate; we believe their joint sponsorship of civil rights measures would set the stage for a momentous congressional drama.

What is most noteworthy at this stage is the widespread lack of enthusiasm for JAVITS' move manifested by dignitaries of both parties. Republican Senate Leader DIRKSEN quickly disparaged the effort, asserting that southern Democrats would surely throttle any such legislation in the brief session ahead. There is overwhelming silence on the Democratic side.

But neither evasion nor muteness will fool most of the people in this moral trial.

JAVITS' stand provides assurance that all the key characters in our 1960 political play will have to stand up and be counted.

The incontestable fact is that an authentic alliance of northern Republicans and liberal Democrats can secure the enactment of new civil rights bills this month. At the very least it can pass legislation giving U.S. aid to school districts which comply with the school desegregation order and augmenting the powers of the Attorney General to initiate prosecutions for violations of civil rights.

These planks are common to the platforms of both parties. By attaching them to such pending legislation as the housing bill, the coalition could force a quick vote on cloture and settle very early in the session—without obstructing other vital legislation—how many Senators are prepared to carry out their pious convention pledges.

Mr. KENNEDY and Mr. NIXON can obtain the required votes if they make a resolute effort. Will either or both rise to the occasion?

The test is clear.

Mr. JAVITS subsequently said: Mr. President, in connection with S. 3829, which I introduced this morning, I made a request for a second reading tomorrow.

I have discussed the matter with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], and I make the unanimous-consent request that no proceedings be taken on S. 3829 on tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE POLARIS SUBMARINE PROGRAM

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, a ballistic missile fired with range and accuracy from a nuclear submarine without even coming to the surface is reminiscent of the science fiction stories of other days. Now it is a reality. By the end of the year it will be a part of American seapower, on the move.

To me, the high point in the President's special message to Congress on Monday was his report:

Extraordinary progress has been made in testing one of America's most important weapons systems—the Polaris ballistic missile submarine.

I can hardly express what it meant to me to hear the President go on to declare that the time is now right to step up the Polaris program. Perhaps I have seemed to have a phobia about the Polaris submarine. More than 2½ years ago I spoke in the Senate for an all-out drive to develop this weapons system. My heart was in that speech and I have been clamoring on this subject ever since.

A weapon which packs the destructive power of all the conventional bombs dropped by both sides in World War II, which has 140 million square miles of ocean area in which to move, which cannot be discovered and knocked out by surprise attack, which is comparatively inexpensive and does not require flotillas of escort ships, which does not require bases within the area and sovereignty of other nations from which to strike, is, in my opinion, the ultimate weapon of our generation.

The whole development of Polaris from conception to completion in less than 5 years is one of the triumphs of our time. We owe a debt of gratitude to the President, to the Navy, to the Congress, and to the 3,000 business firms who contributed to its success.

However, as the President said Monday, this is no time to rest on our oars. With two Polaris submarines on the firing line, five new ones already assigned to shipyards for construction and advance planning, and procurement for five more to be built next year, we are on the way.

We must have more, and with the longer range version which the President calls for.

Mr. President, no other nation on earth has developed such a weapon. The Nation which has it today is not second best to anyone. Rapid production of Polaris submarines in sufficient quantity spells real security.

THE STABILITY OF THE DOLLAR AND THE GOVERNMENT'S RECORD ON TAXATION, THE BUDGET, AND DEBT MANAGEMENT

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, the distinguished chairman of the Senate Republican policy committee, the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES], is the author of a recent study on the stability of the dollar and the Government's record on taxation, the budget, and debt management.

This study deals with vital areas, providing an excellent history of recent happenings—and it does so concisely and in most usable form.

For these reasons, I commend it to my colleagues—especially those on this side of the aisle. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed at this point in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the study was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE STABILITY OF THE DOLLAR; THE TAX REDUCTION RECORD; THE BUDGET AND DEBT MANAGEMENT RECORD; AND THE ADVANCES MADE BY THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT DURING THE REPUBLICAN ADMINISTRATION, 1953–60

(By U.S. Senator STYLES BRIDGES, of New Hampshire, senior Republican member of the Senate Appropriations Committee and chairman of the Senate Republican policy committee)

STABILITY OF THE DOLLAR

When the Republican administration took office in January 1953 it found that the dollar had lost almost half of its purchasing power since 1939.

The consumer's dollar in January 1953 was worth only 52 cents in terms of the food, clothing, shelter, and other items it would buy compared to 1939.

During the past 7 years the value of the dollar has decreased by about 5 cents as contrasted with the 48-cent loss in the preceding 14 years. Furthermore, there has been no appreciable change in the value of the dollar during the last year.

Inflation acts like a special tax which hits hardest widows and orphans, retired persons, and working people with fixed incomes.

The relative stabilization of the purchasing power of the dollar during the Republican administration has, in effect, saved these groups from such a special tax. Financial stability has been achieved simultaneously with record high levels of personal income and consumer spending. The highest standard of living in American history has thus been reached.

TAX REDUCTION

The 1954 tax reduction during the Republican administration, amounting to $7.4 billion was the largest tax cut in history.

The largest item in the tax reduction program was a cut of $3 billion in individual income taxes.

Individuals also shared in the savings from the excise tax reductions and in the benefits provided in the tax revision law of 1954. Of the $7.4 billion returned to taxpayers, tax savings of approximately $4.6 billion went to individuals and $2.8 billion to corporations.

Individuals received:
Individual income tax savings	$3,000,000,000
Savings in excise tax cuts	800,000,000
Tax revision law savings	800,000,000
Corporations received:
Excess profits tax termination	2,000,000,000
Share in excise tax cuts	200,000,000
Tax revision law savings	600,000,000

The percentage distribution of the $7.4 billion was 62.2 percent to individuals and 37.8 percent to corporations.

The reduction in individual income taxes was about 10 percent for the lowest and middle income brackets. It was only slightly more than 1 percent in the top brackets.

Subsequent to 1954, the administration opposed revenue-losing measures because of the need of revenue to balance the budget.

However, as part of the farm program, provision was made for refund of the excise tax on gasoline used on a farm.

These refunds amounted to $74 million in the fiscal year 1958 and $79 million in the fiscal year 1959.

In addition, between 1955 and 1960, a number of excise tax changes were enacted which in the aggregate reduced excises by about $700 million. Most of this reduction, over $500 million, resulted from repeal in 1958 of the excises on transportation of property and oil by pipeline. Revisions in the admissions tax in 1956 and 1958 reduced revenues by approximately $80 million, and a reduction of the cabaret tax in 1960 decreased revenues by $20 million.

A BALANCED BUDGET

The Government has continually directed its efforts toward balancing the Federal budget.

This is an accomplishment to which the Republican administration has been pledged from the beginning.

For the individual it is linked directly with stability in the cost of living, in employment, and in earnings.

It puts a sound floor under the Nation's economy.

It inspires the public confidence that is essential to continued economic expansion and sustained prosperity.

It is a convincing demonstration to those nations of the world who have a growing stake in a continuing sound American economy that we are conducting our fiscal affairs in a responsible manner.

Budget surpluses have been achieved in 3 of the last 6 fiscal years and despite the recession engendered deficits of 1958 and 1959, a surplus of $1.1 billion was realized in the fiscal year 1960, and a surplus of $4.2 billion is projected for fiscal 1961 under the President's program.

TAX REVISION

The tax revision law enacted in 1954 provided benefits for every American by removing hardships on millions of individual taxpayers, effecting the simplification and clarification of our earlier tax laws, closing some loopholes, and reducing some unnecessary restraints on business.

Tax pressures and injustices were eased by the new code for such groups as working mothers, parents of children who are helping pay their way through schools, retired people, families with heavy medical expenses, farmers in need of new equipment, people with sick and accident policies, persons with nonrelative dependents, farmers engaged in soil and water conservation, and many others.

The code rearranged the tax burdens so as to make it easier for the economy to move forward. The goal was to improve the laws so as to help the economy to grow and so create more and better jobs and better living for everyone. Provisions for more liberal depreciation allowances, and in a small measure offering relief from the double taxation of dividends, helped accomplish this.

An important development pushed by Republicans was the Technical Amendments Act of 1958 (Public Law 85–859, approved September 2, 1958).

This measure strengthened the revenue system by closing loopholes and by foreclosing unintended benefits, most of which were the result of carrying over provisions of the 1939 code into the 1954 code.

This act also removed hardships which had previously existed in the tax law.

In addition, the Small Business Tax Revision Act of 1958, which was incorporated in Public Law 85–859, provided substantial tax relief for small business.

Among the provisions aiding small business were: More liberal loss deductions in certain cases involving small business corporations, extension of the net operating loss carryback, more liberal depreciation allowances, more time to pay estate taxes attributable to investment in closely held business enterprises, and an increase in the amount of earnings that a small business may accumulate without being subject to the tax on improper accumulation of surplus.

Besides these broad tax acts there have been a number of specific adjustments in the tax law to correct inequities and provide limited relief. For example, in 1960 the 3-percent limitation was removed with respect to medical expenses incurred by a taxpayer for the care of a dependent parent who is 65 years of age or over, thus allowing the deduction of the first dollar of these expenses.

Further progress was made toward tax simplification. The card return form 1040A was revised in 1958 to permit its use by employees with less than $10,000 of income (rather than $5,000). As a result of this and other changes, as many as 31 million individuals can now qualify to use this simple tax return as compared with 14 million who filed it for 1957. A new income tax return form 1040W, was introduced in 1959 to serve the needs of individual income-tax payers not eligible to use punch-card form 1040A, but whose affairs do not require all the detail specified on regular form 1040. The new form may be used by taxpayers whose incomes consist of salaries and wages regardless of amount, and not more than $200 of dividends and interest, and no other items of income.

A concerted effort was made to expedite the completion of regulations to simplify and increase understanding of the tax law. In this connection, a new regulation on travel expenses was developed which relieves employees who account to their employer for their business travel expenses from reporting such expenses in their individual tax returns. Another regulation permits teachers to deduct educational expenses if their purpose is to update and expand knowledge of the subject taught, to learn improved teaching methods, or otherwise improve teaching effectiveness.

The Excise Tax Technical Changes Act of 1958 revised many excise provisions. Because of lack of time, excises were not given full consideration during the development of the new Internal Revenue Code of 1954. The 1958 act was designed to correct inequities and disparities of a technical nature and was not concerned with the general question of excise-tax rates. Major revisions were made in the terminology of the taxes on communications, the method of computing the stamp taxes on stocks, the statutes relating to distilled spirits, and the provisions relating to credits and refunds.

In recognition of the need for a permanent and equitable method of taxation of life insurance companies, the Secretary of the Treasury, in April 1958, sent to the House Ways and Means Committee suggested approaches to the long-range solution of this problem. These suggestions were incorporated in the Life Insurance Company Income Tax Act of 1959, signed into law by the President on June 25, 1960.

To strengthen our Federal system of Government, the Republican administration recommended the enactment of proposals made by the joint Federal-State action committee which called for the transfer of responsibility for certain functions from the Federal Government to the States and the relinquishment of a portion of certain Federal taxes to assist the States in financing these responsibilities.

As the budget permits, additional reforms will be undertaken to increase the fairness of the tax system, to reduce the tax restraints on incentives to work and invest, and wherever feasible to simplify the tax laws. The Treasury Department is making a study of various possible tax adjustments and is cooperating with the House Ways and Means Committee in developing plans for an inquiry into the opportunities for constructive reform of the Federal tax system.

ENROLLMENT TO PRACTICE BEFORE THE REVENUE SERVICE

New Treasury programs have been instituted to assist taxpayers in their dealings with the Revenue Service. The almost exclusionary type of examination required for applicants for enrollment to practice before the Revenue Service who were not lawyers, certified public accountants, or former Service employees was abandoned and a new realistic examination prepared.

Another change will permit the many small taxpayers who have their returns prepared by people who are not lawyers or CPA's to have the preparer represent the taxpayer before examining officers and revenue agents.

These changes will make available to taxpayers a greater number of well-qualified people to represent them at any level of the Service and will also permit the preparers of returns to assist taxpayers in resolving their usually minor problems with the Service.

DEBT MANAGEMENT

Debt management policies of the Treasury Department under the Republicans have been keyed to the administration's objective of promoting high employment, rising production, and a stable dollar.

Financings have been designed to tie in with Federal Reserve System actions to keep the supply of money and credit in line with the needs of the country. In addition, the administration has sought by numerous means to distribute the debt more widely among the people.

Since January of 1953 about $50 billion of marketable bonds running 5 years or more to maturity have been sold, in contrast to only $5 billion in the previous 6 years. This has prevented a further erosion in the average length of the debt.

The Treasury has instituted a number of technical improvements designed to facilitate its financing operations. The pricing of new issues at a slight premium or discount has enabled the Treasury to attune its offerings more closely to the market and consequently to get the best deal at the cheapest cost to the Government, consistent with other debt management objectives.

The Treasury has extended the auction method of selling securities to include 6-month bills, and has extended this principle to 1-year bills maturing on a regular basis four times a year. The auction method puts the burden of pricing on those who participate in the bidding and reduces the uncertainty and unsettlement in the market that tends to arise when the Treasury sells issues at a fixed price.

The Treasury has also taken steps to "routinize" its other short-term debt operations by concentrating these short-term maturities as much as possible in mid-February, May, August, and November, and to even up, as far as possible, the short-term debt coming due during each of these four dates. This is helping to assure a smoother operation in rolling over these maturities. These technical improvements in the short-term area will also be helpful in setting the stage for longer term financing.

In the 85th session of Congress the Treasury requested legislation which would have provided:

1. Removal of the 3.26-percent interest ceiling on savings bonds which, together with other changes, would permit the Treasury to go forward with a reinvigorated savings bond program.

2. Removal of the 4¼-percent interest rate ceiling on new Treasury bond issues—an imperative need to enable the Treasury to avoid an excess of short-term financing.

3. Technical amendments designed to improve the management of the public debt, foremost being a provision for the deferral of tax gains or losses by participants in advance refunding operations in which holders of Treasury securities (in advance of maturity) are offered securities with longer maturities in exchange.

The legislation in its final form enabled the Treasury to increase the yields on series E and H savings bonds to 3¾ percent retroactive to June 1, 1959. As a result the savings bond sales and redemption picture has improved measurably, easing the problem of maintaining a widespread distribution of an important segment of the public debt in the hands of millions of small savers.

The provision for deferral of tax gains and losses in advance refunding operations was granted by Congress and in June 1960, the Treasury offered holders of the 2½ percent bonds of 1961 an opportunity to exchange a portion of their holdings for a 4-year note or an 8-year bond. Over $4 billion of the $11 billion outstanding 2½ percent bonds were exchanged for the new securities, mostly for the 4-year note. This, of course, significantly reduces the future problem of refunding the large 2½ percent bond in November 1961 and is an additional step toward the objective of improving the maturity structure of the marketable public debt.

It is most unfortunate that the Democratic-controlled Congress failed to take action on the requested removal of the 4¼ percent interest rate ceiling on new Treasury bond issues, and continuation of this arbitrary restriction is unjustifiable. The Treasury will continue to press for the flexibility necessary to handle the Government's financial affairs in a sound manner.

INTERNATIONAL FINANCIAL ARRANGEMENTS

The Secretary of the Treasury is Chairman of the National Advisory Council on International Monetary and Financial Problems, which coordinates the policies and operations of the U.S. representatives on international financial institutions and the international financial policies and operations of U.S. Government agencies, including the Export-Import Bank, the International Cooperation Administration, the Development Loan Fund and other agencies involved in foreign lending. The Secretary of the Treasury is also U.S. Governor of the International Monetary Fund, the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, and the International Finance Corporation.

The Treasury Department played the major role in carrying out the President's recommendation that the resources of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and the International Monetary Fund be increased by substantial amounts.

The purpose of the increases is to enable the two institutions to continue to carry forward in the years ahead the constructive policies that they have pursued during the first 13 years of their existence.

In June 1959, the President signed the legislation authorizing U.S. participation in the increases, and the Treasury Department promptly took steps to make the required payments. By September 1959, a sufficient number of countries had signified their approval of the increases to meet the minimum amounts required under the terms of the proposal. This forward-looking step in the international field thus has become a reality.

The Treasury has taken part in major financial negotiations and consultations with a number of countries, including the United Kingdom at the time of the Suez crisis in 1956 and the establishment of nonresident convertibility in 1958. Other discussions were held with the Federal Republic of Germany, France on various occasions, Turkey, Argentina, Brazil, India, and several others.

The Treasury Department of the Republican administration took a leading part in developing a plan for, and played a major role in, negotiations for the establishment of the Inter-American Development Bank with the 21 American Republics as members. The charter for the proposed Bank was initiated in April 1959, and the Treasury Department bore the main responsibility for obtaining legislation providing for U.S. membership. The President signed the required legislation on September 1, 1959.

All American Republics except Cuba have taken similar steps and accepted membership. The Bank has elected a president, directors, and principal officers and will begin operations on October 1, 1960.

The existence of the Bank will further affirm the deep interest of the United States in its economic relations with the Republics of the Western Hemisphere.

The Treasury has made and renewed exchange agreements with a number of Latin American countries to assist them in keeping their currencies in orderly relations with the dollar and in maintaining their exchange systems free from restrictions, generally in cooperation with the International Monetary Fund.

Most recently, the Secretary of the Treasury has vigorously pressed forward the proposal to create a new multilateral lending organization, to be known as the International Development Association.

This organization would be an affiliate of the International Bank and would be authorized to make loans for the economic development of less developed areas on terms more flexible than those which the International Bank can provide.

The institution will provide for the cooperative association of the industrial countries of the free world with the United States in an institution devoted to development lending on flexible terms. In addition, the International Development Association may provide an opportunity for the utilization of some of the foreign currencies derived from oversea programs of the United States. The National Advisory Council, in August 1959, reported favorably to the Congress on the establishment of such an organization. At the annual meeting of the Governors of the International Bank, in September 1959, the Secretary, as U.S. Governor, proposed a resolution calling upon the Executive Directors of the International Bank to formulate Articles of Agreement for an International Development Association. This resolution was unanimously adopted by the Board of Governors, and legislation providing for U.S. membership is being considered in the Congress.

Through the measures noted above the United States has again demonstrated a high degree of effective leadership in the international financial field.

MANAGEMENT IMPROVEMENTS

Constant attention to ways in which the Treasury's work can be performed more efficiently and economically has made it possible to reduce the number of civilian personnel in the Department from 87,800 in January 1953 to 74,200 in January 1960, a reduction of 13,600 employees, or 16 percent. At the same time, workload figures in most bureaus have increased significantly. For example, the number of checks issued has increased by 50 percent, the number of checks paid by 30 percent, the number of persons clearing customs by 25 percent, the number of regular Treasury securities issued by over 100 percent, the number of carriers entering the United States by 35 percent, and the number of coins manufactured by 55 percent.

During the first full fiscal year after the Republican administration took office, almost $21 million was saved as a result of immediate economy measures taken. When initial economy efforts lagged, the Secretary gave personal leadership to a search for economies throughout the Department which gave impetus to the Department's regular efforts to improve management. The Department's management improvement efforts under the present administration have resulted in total tangible annual savings of $74.5 million.

Many of the economies resulted in direct improvements in services to the public, such as the following:

1. Goods in world trade move through the American customs with less difficulty and less delay. A huge backlog of unliquidated entries has been substantially reduced. Red-tape has been cut on merchandise classification and duty rate determination. Prompt determination of duties on imports has been made possible, with the determinations based on current prices in our foreign trade.

2. Customs declaration forms for the individual passenger have been greatly simplified and continued improvements have been made in income tax forms.

3. Tax administration has been greatly improved by prompt settlement of tax disputes.

Internal operations have been greatly simplified and speeded up by organizational realinements and the decentralization of functions, by the continued modernization and mechanization of procedures, and by increased attention to the recruitment and training of personnel of the highest type. A few examples of these improvements follow:

1. The number of supervisory regional offices of the Internal Revenue Service was reduced from 17 to 9.

2. The use of electronic equipment for paying and reconciling Government checks, and for processing the redemption of savings bonds will save approximately $4 million on a Government-wide basis.

3. Widespread technological improvements have been made in the manufacture of currency and coins, such as the installation of eight new sheet-fed rotary intaglio presses to print currency at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing with savings of $1.8 million.

4. Improved audit and collection procedures in the Internal Revenue Service have resulted in increased revenue collections.

5. The Internal Revenue Service is collecting Federal liquor and tobacco taxes by means of returns instead of by sale of tax stamps with expected annual savings of $1.2 million.

6. The Federal Boating Act of 1958 is designed to promote boating safety in the United States. It requires the numbering for identification of all motor propelled boats and gives the U.S. Coast Guard civil penalty authority in addition to its present criminal penalty authority for reckless operation of motorboats. Cost of the program is expected to be met by fees to be paid for numbering certificates to be issued to boatowners. The number of pleasure boats in operation is estimated to be increasing by about 500,000 a year since 1947 to a total of over 8 million in 1959.

As the senior Republican Member in the Senate I am proud of the great progress and advancement made on behalf of the American people by the Treasury Department under the Republican administration.

CIVIL RIGHTS LEGISLATION

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, which has performed a great service throughout the years on behalf of the promotion of human equality for all our citizens, on Monday of this week issued a statement calling upon the Congress to enact civil rights legislation in this August session.

As usual, the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights has made a positive, constructive, sincere and moderate proposal.

It goes without saying that I share their hope that such legislation can be considered and enacted into law before we adjourn sine die. The proposals which they set forth are ones which I have offered myself and which I have voted for in the present Congress.

I was pleased to note the Leadership Conference's determination to do everything possible to see that civil rights legislation does not become a political football, and its hope that civil rights bills will not be offered as a roadblock to other important legislation such as medical aid for the aged, housing, school construction and minimum wages. May I suggest to my Republican friends on the other side of the aisle that they take these words to heart. Civil rights legislation must not be made into a political football or offered to block social legislation which this Congress is determined to enact into law at this session.

My thoughts on this subject are expressed in a joint statement which the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK] and I prepared yesterday. I ask unanimous consent that our statement and the statement by the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights be inserted at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statements were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF SENATORS HUBERT H. HUMPHREY, DEMOCRAT, OF MINNESOTA, AND JOSEPH S. CLARK, DEMOCRAT, OF PENNSYLVANIA, ON CIVIL RIGHTS LEGISLATION, AUGUST 9, 1960

We stand firmly on the civil rights plank of the Democratic Party adopted at Los Angeles; but to interject an extended civil rights debate into the present Senate session at this time would be to obstruct passage of any legislation at all.

We came back to Washington to help complete unfinished business, namely:

1. Ratify the Antarctic Treaty.

2. Pass the vitally needed appropriations measures including mutual security now pending in the Congress.

3. Pass a Federal aid to education bill to assist in providing adequate classrooms and decent pay for teachers.

4. Provide medical care for the elderly.

5. Enact a good housing bill; and

6. Raise the minimum wage and extend its coverage.

These last four measures implement important human rights for large groups in our population now denied these rights. Each of these four measures is a specific commitment in the 1960 Democratic platform.

Our first job is to pass this legislation and do it as promptly as possible.

If the time remains to attempt to pass meaningful civil rights legislation, we will be in the forefront of an effort to do so. Whether we will have enough time depends on how long the Republicans delay enactment of the unfinished business.

The maneuvering of the Republicans in the Senate yesterday and today makes clear that their objective is to prevent the enactment of the legislation listed above and exploit the civil rights issue for political purposes only.

We do not mean to be parties to any such effort.

STATEMENT ON CIVIL RIGHTS LEGISLATION IN AUGUST SESSION OF CONGRESS BY LEADERSHIP CONFERENCE ON CIVIL RIGHTS, ROY WILKINS, CHAIRMAN, ARNOLD ARONSON, SECRETARY, AUGUST 8, 1960

As organizations dedicated to the advancement of civil rights in America, we call upon both political parties for assistance in the enactment of civil rights legislation at the reconvened August session of Congress.

Both parties have adopted strong civil rights planks with substantial areas of agreement between them. We ask both parties for an August downpayment on these planks as an earnest of their intention to execute the planks in full during the next administration.

While we shall press to obtain civil rights legislation at this session of Congress, we are equally determined to do everything possible to see that such legislation does not become a political football.

Civil rights bills must be handled sincerely on their own merits and not in such a way as to constitute a body block to consideration of other legislation before the Congress, as, for example, medical aid for the aged, housing, school construction, and minimum wages.

To the end that civil rights legislation may become a reality rather than a political pawn, we call upon Vice President NIXON and Senator KENNEDY to take this issue out of the partisan arena by agreeing upon a measure or measures which both parties can push to enactment along with other legislation at this short session.

We suggest that a basis for such an agreement lies in legislation proposed by both platforms upon which hearings have already been held by the Congress. As possible examples of such legislation, we suggest legislation which would:

1. Facilitate compliance with the Supreme Court's desegregation decisions by extending Federal aid and technical assistance to schools which in good faith attempt to desegregate.

2. Authorize the Attorney General to bring actions in Federal courts to protect constitutional rights.

3. Establish a statutory body to protect equal job opportunities on Government contracts.

It has been established over the years that neither party alone can deliver on civil rights promises. What is vital now is that the two candidates agree upon legislation which both will support actively in accordance with the pledges of their respective platforms.

We are confident that the necessary two-thirds can be mustered for cloture in the Senate if Vice President NIXON is determined to obtain the support of two-thirds of the Republicans and if Senator KENNEDY is determined to obtain the support of two-thirds of the Democrats (southern Democrats represent substantially less than one-third of the total number of Senate Democrats).

As far as the House is concerned, the Rules Committee could hardly be a stumbling block if Speaker RAYBURN, acting for Senator KENNEDY, and Minority Leader HALLECK, acting for Vice President NIXON, jointly seek committee action.

On this road lies the possibility, even the probability, of civil rights legislation at this session of Congress and this can be accomplished without the excuse that to so act would hold up full consideration of other pending and needed legislation. A test of the good faith of the parties and of the Presidential candidates will lie in their willingness to avoid partisan bickering over civil rights and to unite in the enactment of vitally needed civil rights legislation now.

EXCESSES AGAINST AMERICANS IN CUBA

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, last March in an extended address to this body, I warned against entertaining any further illusions as to the Communist character of the Castro regime in Cuba. I also warned that any inaction on our part would merely encourage Castro and his associates, posing as a "government," to engage in further excesses against Americans, our national dignity and honor, and American rights and interests in Cuba.

Castro's seizure of all American property in Cuba without even the empty mockery of pretending to pay for any of it with worthless paper at some future date has more than vindicated my warnings in the past.

The current August issue of the American Legion magazine carries an excellent article on Castro, his background, and what we may expect from him. The article is entitled "Castro Can Be Stopped Without Bullets" and was written by Edward Tomlinson, a well-known authority on Latin America. Mr. Tomlinson served as a newspaperman in South America for more than 30 years and has also lectured on this subject for many years.

In his article Mr. Tomlinson notes that many of the liberals who stanchly supported Castro in the beginning and for a year or more after he seized power continued to give him the benefit of the doubt, hoping he would finally display some degree of sanity and responsibility, "have lost hope and now admit publicly that Cuba is a Communist bridgehead in the Americas and a mortal threat to the security of the United States and the whole hemisphere."

Mr. Tomlinson warns:

Although there is no longer any doubt on the part of most of our Government officials that the Castro dictatorship is communistic and a stiletto at our jugular vein, some of them shrink from any firm and decisive steps to prevent it from spreading to other less advanced American Republics.

I commend the article to all Senators and others interested in gaining a better understanding of and promoting better relations with the other American Republics. I ask unanimous consent that the American Legion magazine article, "Castro Can Be Stopped Without Bullets," be printed in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CASTRO CAN BE STOPPED WITHOUT BULLETS

(The time has come to remove the props that support a rabble-rouser who, at every turn, plays the Communist game.)

(By Edward Tomlinson)

There no longer can be any doubt that Fidel Castro and his henchmen have established a communistic, if not a Moscow-dominated, regime in Cuba. Nor can there be much question that if left to flourish, its deadly contagion will spread to other Latin American countries.

Even if it is not Russian-inspired, or Kremlin-dominated, the political, economic, and social policies it has proclaimed and the methods it employs to carry them out are an unmistakable facsimile of those practiced in the Soviet Union.

As in all Communist countries, the Castro government is a dictatorship of the cruelest type under which every citizen is subject to the whims of its rulers.

Among its motley entourage are any number of men, including Castro himself, who not only were delinquent from their youth up, but who had lurid records of Communist association and indoctrination long before they ever dreamed of taking over the sugar-rich island.

Like all Communist rulers, they came to power by force and bloodshed and are maintaining themselves by the same means. No one has been able to prove that the majority of Cuban citizens actually support the despotic Castro dynasty. They have had no chance to express themselves at a ballot box or by any other fair and impartial method.

If all the estimated 500,000 rural workers and country bumpkins who from time to time are hauled into Havana from the hinterland to shout vivas to Fidel's frenzied harangues actually believe or even understand what he says, there still are 6 million other Cubans whose opinions have neither been voiced nor sought.

Many of the key figures who fought with the bearded fanatic in the revolution have turned against him. Hardly a day passes that Cuban exiles do not arrive in this or other nearby countries. Most of these people have declared that they fled their homeland because the Communists have been allowed to take over.

Even if Fidel, as he is popularly known in Cuba, has never carried a Communist card, his favorite associates, since his student days, have been known Communists as well as extremists of every stripe.

His very childhood was spent in a lawless and often violent environment. His father, Angel Castro, was a Spanish immigrant who came to the island in the early nineties. After 7 years as a pick-and-shovel man on an American-owned sugar plantation in eastern Oriente Province, he was fired and indicted for theft. He jumped trial and went out into the backwoods and squatted on the property of absentee ranchers and farmers. In Cuba it has always been difficult to eject squatters once they have settled down.

In 1917 the elder Castro took part in a local civil war as the head of a group of recruits from his own and surrounding farms. Actually, he spent most of his time moving fences on neighboring ranches and taking over more property, so that by the end of the conflict he had accumulated a small fortune.

From such surroundings Fidel and his younger brother, Raul, went off to parochial schools in Santiago de Cuba, and eventually to a Jesuit high school in Havana. In 1945 Fidel enrolled at the University of Havana. From the very first he was the overbearing bully and rabble rouser he is today, determined to dominate everybody around him. But he was unpopular with the majority of the students because of his uncouth manners and fanatical arguments. He wore dirty clothes and seemed never to take a bath. The youngsters nicknamed him "Bola de Churro," or grease ball.

Shunned by the great body of students, he teamed up with the flaming leftist and hoodlum elements, at the time numerous in all the big Cuban public educational institutions.

During the period 1945–47 the university, as described by one of its most distinguished professors, was "a training ground for intellectual gangsters. These groups," he declared, "were involved in no less than 164 murders, for which nobody was ever punished."

In 1947 Fidel and most of his friends were involved in the Cayo Confites filibustering expedition, a freebooting attempt by irresponsible students, soldiers of fortune, and a few burning idealists to invade the Dominican Republic and overthrow dictator Rafael Trujillo. But before the adventurers could set sail, the Organization of American States cracked down on the Cuban Government and the force was disbanded.

Returning to the university Fidel resumed his old associations. Terrorism among the students rose to new heights and he and other hotheads were arrested several times and haled into court, but each time they succeeded in escaping conviction. Meantime, he had come under the influence of Alfredo Guevara and Lionel Soto, the two principal Communist Party leaders in the university. He remained in close contact with these two Reds during the remainder of his student days.

One high U.S. Government employee, who was studying Spanish at the university in those days, personally confirms that Fidel became fascinated with the writings of Karl Marx. He also read and went around the campus spouting his enthusiasm for the Communist theories expressed in The Yenan Way, a book written by Eudocio Ravines, a prominent Peruvian Communist. The Yenan Way depicts the Chinese Communist road to power and suggests that its methods would be more suitable than those of the Soviet Union in waging communism in the Latin American countries.

In early 1948 Fidel was implicated in two more murders in Havana and was arrested. Again, he escaped conviction. In April of that year he and others among his closest colleagues found it advisable to take several weeks of vacation outside Cuba.

Curiously enough, their vacation period coincided with the Ninth International Conference of American States, which met in Bogotá, Colombia, that year. Gen. George C. Marshall, then Secretary of State, headed our delegation. The conference was destined to be disrupted by one of the bloodiest revolutionary outbreaks in the history of the southern continent.

Meantime, Fidel Castro of Cuba and a fellow student by the name of Rafael del Pino had made their way to Bogotá, as Cuban members of an international "anti-imperialist" student organization scheduled to convene in the Colombian capital simultaneously with the gathering of inter-American statesmen. The purpose of the student meeting, ostensibly, was to agitate against colonialism in the Western Hemisphere. Colombian officials later established that this assemblage was financed by the Communist Party, and that Fidel and Del Pino were there representing the party in Cuba.

According to a book published in 1949 by Alberto Nino, then chief of the Colombian secret police, the activities of all the foreign students were under strict surveillance from the time of their arrival. Señor Nino pointed out that the two Cubans were special objects of attention because of advance information that they had traveled by way of Caracas, Venezuela, and had conferred with Communists in that country.

At any rate, the police learned that a few hours after their arrival in Bogotá the Cubans made contact with representatives of the Soviet Embassy. That night their hotel room was searched and incriminating literature was confiscated. A few evenings later, the two were caught redhanded in a theater distributing leaflets in which the United States was denounced as the chief imperialist of the hemisphere.

On April 8 Castro and Del Pino held a meeting with militant agitators of the Colombian Labor Federation at which they lectured on "the techniques of the general strike and armed uprisings." It was the next day, April 9, that the revolution broke and 3,000 persons were killed or wounded within 24 hours.

The Nino volume goes on to say that investigations following the blood bath showed that Castro and Del Pino had taken active part in the uprising. At any rate, Colombian President Mariano Ospina Perez publicly denounced them as "Communists who have been in the leadership of the insurrection." But before they could be taken into custody they took refuge in the Cuban Embassy; and Dr. Guillermo Belt, head of the Cuban delegation to the conference, who was also the Cuban Ambassador in Washington, arranged to have them flown out of the country.

There are people in this country who still seem to be under the impression, or the delusion, that Fidel Castro was a creature of the dictatorship of Fulgencio Batista, that he is a sort of white knight who rose out of that despotism to restore liberty and freedom to the Cuban people.

Whatever else may be said against the former dictator, he was neither responsible for, nor the excuse for, Fidel Castro's rebellious and violent tendencies. During all the years Castro was running with the terrorists, gangsters, and Communists at the University of Havana, joining in soldier-of-fortune adventures, and mixing in bloody insurrections in foreign countries, Batista was not even in Cuba, much less in power. In the years from 1945 to 1948 the old sergeant and former President was living quietly abroad, most of the time in the United States. He did not return to power in Cuba until 1952.

The President of Cuba during those years was Dr. Ramon Grau San Martin, himself an oldtime leftist, who in his earlier days as an instructor in the University of Havana Medical College had been a Communist sympathizer. In fact, throughout his administration as President the Reds in Cuba enjoyed a field day. Under him communism flourished in the labor unions and at the university. It was during his administration that the university was a "training ground for intellectual gangsters," among whom was the man destined to become its most famous student, Fidel Castro.

In June 1948 Carlos Prio Soccaras was elected to succeed Grau San Martin. Upon assuming office, President Prio began slapping down the Communists. At the time the party boasted a membership of 158,000. He broke their hold on most of the big labor unions and weeded them out of government.

Meantime, Fidel had received his law degree at the university, and had entered politics, on the antiadministration side, of course. For a time he seemed to have cooled toward his leftist and Communist friends. But Prio officials said differently. They pointed out that he had had so many close shaves with the law that he realized if he was to get anywhere in politics he had to present a more circumspect front.

Unfortunately, the fiery revolutionary was unable to get along with the top leaders of the important opposition groups. As usual, he wanted to dominate them. Even so, he announced himself as a candidate for Congress in the 1952 elections and launched a bitter campaign against the Prio regime. But the elections were never held. It was on March 10, 1952, that Batista sprang his military coup, ousted Prio, and annulled the elections. Naturally, Fidel was outraged and began his long struggle to drive the dictator from power and from Cuba.

He forged his ties with the university groups, including his old Communist advisers, Guevara and Soto. He became a close friend of Blas Roca, secretary general of the Communist Party, and of another Marxist enthusiast, Raul Roa, who was eventually to become his Foreign Minister.

On July 26, 1953, Fidel and his followers made a foolhardy but bloody attack on an army barracks in Santiago de Cuba, which failed after dozens of men on both sides had been killed and wounded. Most of the attackers were arrested, tried, and sent to prison for 15 years. Later Batista pardoned Fidel and permitted him to go into exile in Mexico, where, according to Mexican authorities, he immediately made contact with Communist elements.

It was in Mexico that he met Ernesto "Che" Guevara. "Che" Guevara (no relation to the Guevara of the University of Havana), is not a Cuban but an Argentine. Today "Che" (an old Argentine term for pal or buddy) is the financial boss of Castro's government as well as the master of the island's entire industrial setup.

"Che" Guevara had started out in Argentina much in the manner of Fidel Castro in Cuba. He was a student at the University of Buenos Aires at about the same time Fidel was active at the University of Havana. Like Fidel, he was a fanatic and a leftist, closely associated with the Communists in the university. He, too, tried to be top dog among the students but was extremely unpopular with the majority.

He organized his own group and promoted organized strikes against professors who refused to cater to his whims. As a result, he was in continual hot water with the police and eventually had to leave the country. He headed for Guatemala, at the time Red-dominated President Jacobo Arbenz was in office. He joined up with the Red labor leaders in the little Central American Republic and worked with them until the revolution of 1954, when he escaped into Mexico.

Mexican sources say it was no accident that Guevara made the acquaintance of Fidel Castro and that the two became such fast friends. As one Mexican diplomat put it: "The Communists had ordained it long in advance." At any rate, they spent a year and a half studying Marxist economics at the Mexican Labor College, which is operated by pro-Communist labor leader Vicente Lombardo Toledano. Meantime, with the help of Mexican Communists and extreme nationalists throughout the Caribbean and in this country, they raised money and plotted their now historic invasion of Cuba, which took place on December 3, 1956. In the course of his meanderings prior to this invasion, Castro entered the United States illegally and was returned to Mexico. He was refused a visa to enter the United States in 1956 because of his Communist activity.

Raul Castro, the second most influential person in Fidel's ruling clique, spent a short time at the University of Havana, but soon went off to Communist Czechoslovakia for instruction and indoctrination by the Reds in that satellite state. Behind the Iron Curtain Raul spent most of his time learning the techniques of sabotage, handling mobs, and easy and quick methods of whipping workers and peasants into fighting militia forces. Raul is the commander in chief of the Castro armies, whom Fidel has designated as his personal successor.

Antonio Nunez Jimenez is the third ranking member of the Fidel team. Nunez is the intellectual of the group. He was a fellow student of Fidel's at the university, and he prepared himself for his destiny in the Castro hierarchy by attending and participating in the various Communist-organized youth and peace congresses around the world.

On his travels he became fascinated with the Soviet and Red Chinese agrarian programs, particularly with collective farming as practiced in those countries. Therefore, it is no surprise that he should become the author of the Castro land confiscation scheme, of which he is today the all-powerful director.

Latin American intelligence and diplomatic services, as well as our own, have charted the backgrounds of a number of the other prominent figures in the present Cuban Government and have documented their sordid involvements. But since his three most powerful right-hand men have had such indisputable communistic associations, it is not necessary to catalog the careers of the others.

Even if Fidel and all of his associates had been completely free of any previous ties with the Reds, their every action since they came to power has been in strict conformity with Communist practices.

Their first act was to destroy, in the best Communist tradition, the keymen of the military forces of the country by executing—most of them publicly—more than 800 top officers of the army, navy and air corps. These bloody purges of the Cuban military rival those of the old Bolsheviks when they took over Russia.

Far from freeing his country of burdensome armies and armament, as he promised during the revolution, Castro has made all Cuba an armed camp. Labor unions have been given guns. Hotel restaurant workers take rifles with them to work. Hoodlums and teenagers walk the streets of Havana with firearms slung over their shoulders. Schoolchildren are organized into "youth militia."

He promised the agricultural workers, who supported and fed his straggling forces during their long siege in the Sierra Maestra, that the big estates, Cuban and foreign owned, would be parceled out to them. So far the big farms and plantations that have been confiscated have been collectivized, and the employees are now working for the state rather than for the private owners.

He pledged the Cuban people a free press and freedom of speech. Today there is no freedom of press or speech. All the leading newspapers and radio stations have been taken over or squeezed out of business. Censorship is stricter than it ever was in the days of Batista.

Free elections have been abolished. Revolutionary or summary tribunals have replaced regular courts of law. A secret police force, far more numerous and powerful than that of the hated Batista, eavesdrops on every citizen day and night. As in all Communist states, friends and even families are required to inform on one another.

Schools and colleges, as well as the University of Havana, are now completely dominated by the government, something Batista was never able to do completely. Textbooks are being rewritten to teach the Castro, not to say the Communist, line.

Practically every policy and device in the totalitarian lexicon has been introduced into Cuba and perpetrated upon the Cuban people. Further to identify the Cuban state with the Communist world, Castro has boldly sought ironclad trade or barter agreements with Russia, Poland, Czechoslovakia, and East Germany; and he has reestablished full diplomatic relations with the Kremlin. Batista had slashed all ties with Moscow.

The United States, Cuba's long and faithful friend, as well as its best customer, has been singled out as the great enemy of the island nation and its people. Only a dedicated Red or a deranged and depraved mind could subscribe to the crude and violent charges that Castro, Guevara, and other parrots of Fidelismo daily heap upon Washington, the American press, and any American citizen who questions what goes on in Havana.

According to Castro, the United States did not help win Cuban independence from Spain. We only got into the Spanish-American War to line our own pockets. The North American exploiters have done nothing but bleed the Cuban people of their lands and riches.

The fact that for years we have obligated ourselves to purchase half the annual Cuban sugar crop at 2 cents more per pound than anybody else pays for it, has been of no benefit to Cuba. It has only enslaved the island. Our newspapers, our radio, and all our agencies of information are damned as "lying organs of imperialism."

Yet no public figure ever had such warm and wholehearted support from these same agencies as was heaped upon Castro while he was fighting to overthrow the Batista dictatorship and for months after he came to power. If all these and other such mouthings had come directly from Khrushchev himself they could not have been closer to the Kremlin line.

Many of the liberals in this country—who stood by him so stanchly in the beginning, and for a year or more after he came to power continued to give him the benefit of the doubt, hoping he would finally display some degree of sanity and responsibility—have lost hope and now admit publicly that Cuba is a Communist bridgehead in the Americas and a mortal threat to the security of the United States and the whole hemisphere.

The Chicago Tribune's crack correspondent, veteran Jules Dubois, who was one of the early champions of the bearded revolutionary, having written a laudatory biography about him, now sees Castro as a Communist-dominated dictator.

Spokesmen for the powerful U.S. labor organizations, the AFL–CIO, which also withheld judgment against the Cuban for many months, now speak of his regime as the Castro-Communist menace.

One of our most distinguished churchmen, Cardinal Cushing of Boston, in a paraphrase of an old epigram, says: "When I see a bird that looks like a duck, waddles like a duck, and quacks like a duck, I know he is a duck."

Although there is no longer any doubt on the part of most of our Government officials that the Castro dictatorship is communistic and a stiletto at our jugular vein, some of them shrink from any firm and decisive steps to prevent it from spreading to other less advanced American Republics.

They point out that in the charter of the Organization of American States and in other diplomatic pledges, and promises we are committed to the principle of nonintervention. In these documents we agreed, in effect, to depart from the historic interpretation of the Monroe Doctrine, and to refrain from taking unilateral action in the political affairs of any of our neighbors. But we did so with the promise that all the others would assume an equal share in preserving the new world from alien interference and influences.

Furthermore, each and every one of our sister Republics is also pledged in the charter to oppose tyranny and to defend free institutions in the Americas. Specifically, in the Dulles resolution adopted at the Caracas Conference in 1954, they declared that "the domination or control of the political institutions of any American state by the international Communist movement would constitute a threat to the sovereignty and political independence of all the American States. Such an eventuality, the resolution provides, would call for a meeting of the foreign ministers of all the American Republics.

The charter of the OAS provides that any nation that feels its security threatened, has the right to call upon the organization for investigation and for protection from such a threat.

Since there no longer is any question in our minds about the menace that confronts us in Cuba, and since we are the chief target of this menace, and since we have indisputable proof of what it is doing and what it intends to do not only in Cuba but in other nations throughout the New World we should not hesitate to demand action.

The heads of any southern government who object to such a request should remember that we compromised on the Monroe Doctrine by making it multilateral instead of unilateral, meaning they are now equal partners in the defense of the hemisphere. If they are so concerned that we may return to the unilateral concept of it, they should get busy and live up to the multilateral concept to which they have subscribed.

We should make it plain that we welcome their cooperation and their initiative, but that we are not going to sit back and wait until our Communist enemies have firmly established themselves throughout the other Americas.

Meantime, we may as well make up our minds that all the leftists, extreme nationalists, Communists, and chronic Yankee-haters from Mexico to Cape Horn, as well as in our own country, are going to damn us no matter what position we take in the matter. But if our neighbors are disposed to shirk their obligations, we might as well know it now and not go on living in a fool's paradise.

If they should turn their backs on us, we still have an effective recourse of our own without resorting to armed intervention or even political intervention. We do not have to send the Marines. Castro can be stopped without U.S. bullets. All we have to do is to refuse any longer to guarantee Cuba a market in this country for half its sugar output, 35 percent of which is produced by U.S. companies whose lands and properties have already been or are to be confiscated without adequate remuneration.

Incidentally, Cuba received from this country last year a total of $150 million above the world market price for the more than 3 million tons we purchased. The amount in 1960 will be practically the same. We also pay cash in dollars, on the barrelhead. Russia and other Communist countries pay in barter and propaganda.

At this moment this extra bounty from Uncle Sam goes a long way toward keeping Cuba afloat financially. Many other major business enterprises throughout the island are merely limping along or have already closed their doors.

Probably the best indication of the actual situation is the lowly state of the Cuban peso. It has been on a par with the dollar ever since the Spanish-American War; but, as this is written, the dollar will buy nearly two and a half pesos in the streets of Havana.

Contrary to general belief, we have no treaty or agreement with the Cuban Government which obligates us to buy any of its sugar. The U.S. sugar law, which fixes the amount and price we pay for the island product, is a domestic law of our own Congress, designed purely for the purpose of assuring the American public of an adequate supply of sugar, since our own production is not sufficient for our needs.

The one benefit reaped from paying the premium price for Cuban sugar is that it helps to keep the price up for the domestic producers. In fact, it is a form of subsidy, which, incidentally, penalizes the American consumer.

The sugar law expires on December 31 of this year, and there is no obligation whatsoever on our part to renew it. If the law is not extended, the biggest single support for the Castro regime will have been removed. No responsible economist, Cuban or American, believes that the despotic regime could long survive if this were done.

Nor would the United States go without sugar. Mexico, Brazil, Argentina, Peru, and half a dozen of the other Latin American countries have large sugar surpluses which they would like to sell here, but cannot because we guarantee Cuba such an overwhelming share of the market. Furthermore, they could easily increase their production.

In fact, there is a world glut of sugar, so much so that an international agreement has been set up to fix production quotas for all the free nations. Actually its purpose is to peg prices. Neither Russia, Red China, nor their satellites are members.

Our own domestic producers might suffer some disadvantage if the law were allowed to expire. They might have to take less for their product, at least for a time. But it is a question of whether the American public prefers to pay more for its sugar, thereby prolonging the life of a communistic Frankenstein here on our doorstep, or to pay less and help to shorten the life of the Castro menace.

Another argument advanced against discontinuing the sugar law as presently drawn is that we would be accused of economic aggression against a neighboring American Republic. Again we say that the United States would not be breaking any contract with Cuba, nor would we be breaking an international agreement, because the law governing our purchases of Cuban sugar is purely a law of our own making. Besides there is no international tenet which says a free nation has to guarantee any other nation a market for its product, even at the going world price, much less at a premium price.

We also repeat that Fidel Castro, Guevara, Raul Castro, and the other members of the Cuban cabal have declared time after time that neither our enormous purchases nor the premium prices we pay for their sugar are of any importance to Cuban economy, but that they merely enslave the Cuban people.

Uncle Sam certainly should not be compelled to enslave his neighbors.

FINANCIAL TRIUMPH FOR WESTERN CAPITALISM

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President. Soviet Premier Khrushchev has stated many times that Communist Russia will surpass the United States economically within a short while.

Unfortunately there are those who take this bloody dictator at his word and cry their doom and gloom talk about how the United States has become a second-rate power with a falling economy.

It is interesting to note that buried inside the newspapers because of the other events, including the Democratic convention, the shooting down of an American plane over international waters, the President's declaration on the Monroe Doctrine as a warning to any alien aggressor, little attention was paid to what is a historic and visible victory for Western capitalism over the planned economy of communism.

We find that the Central Bank of West Germany has made a $240 million loan to the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development.

This important fact means that the underdeveloped world is no longer completely dependent on the United States for capital.

Mr. President, it means that the aid the United States gave to the free countries of Europe has now placed them in a position not only to help themselves but to help others.

It is a triumph of free world free enterprise. It is one of the reasons for Khrushchev's insistence on the Allies getting out of Berlin.

This whole picture is given vividly in the column entitled "Business Outlook," by J. A. Livingston, an outstanding economist, in the July 20 edition of the Washington Post. Because of its interest and the facts it gives, I ask unanimous consent to have this column printed in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BUSINESS OUTLOOK—FINANCIAL TRIUMPH FOR WESTERN CAPITALISM

(By J. A. Livingston)

Too much competition for the front page all at once:

Amid the furore of the Democratic Convention, the exchange between Premier Khrushchev and President Eisenhower over the Monroe Doctrine, the turmoil in the Belgian Congo, and the shooting down of another American plane by the Soviet Union, a major international financial triumph got buried inside newspapers. It helps explain why West Berlin is a festering showcase to Premier Khrushchev.

The Deutsche Bundesbank (Central Bank of West Germany) has made a $240 million loan to the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (World Bank), half in dollars, half in marks. This is a historic and exciting victory for western capitalism in the contest with communism for these reasons:

It's the largest borrowing ever undertaken by the World Bank outside the United States.

It's the largest advance ever made by a central bank to the World Bank and for an unusually long term, 12 years. Other such loans have run from 1 to 3 years and have amounted to $50 million to $75 million and have been divided among several central banks.

The interest rate, 4½ percent, is lower than the going rate in Germany—around 6 percent to 6½ percent. This is less than the Bundesbank's discount rate of 5 percent.

It means that the underdeveloped world is no longer dominantly dependent on the United States for capital. Increasingly, not only Germany, but France, Great Britain, and other Western Powers will shoulder with the United States the rich man's burden.

Most important, it dramatizes the resurgent economic power of Germany. Here is a nation with a sense of destiny, an economic derring-do, which has lifted it from defeat to one of the foremost commercial countries in Western Europe and the world.

Germany has been able to sell its products abroad in competition with other nations. It has built up its reserves of gold and foreign currencies to $5.4 billion. The demand for its goods and services, both at home and from abroad, is so great that the Bundesbank is constantly fighting inflation. Recently it raised the discount rate from 4 percent to 5 percent.

This economic success makes clear to the East Germans, Czechoslovakians, Poles, Rumanians, Bulgarians, and Hungarians that a private-property economic system not only functions, but functions extremely well. The variety of foods, clothing, household wares, and conveniences available in West Germany and, particularly, West Berlin, perpetually belittle the achievements of satellite areas.

The shop-window prosperity of West Germany is palpable, visible, and invidiously superior to what East Berlin offers.

That's why Khrushchev can't stand Chancellor Adenauer. That's why he wants to cut off West Berlin—from its economic bloodstream.

WE LEARN FROM HISTORY

This prosperity proves that men learn from history. After World War I, Germany also demonstrated recuperative strength. But reparations payment drained off capital. The German Government borrowed and borrowed. Ultimately, all Europe went broke.

This time we did not bow down the vanquished with debt. Instead, we extended economic aid. Moreover, the quartering of troops in Western Germany actually proved to be a source of dollar, franc, and sterling income.

Success came not easy. In the early postwar days, Germany's balance of payments was brutally adverse. Marshall Plan aid was necessary. The German currency was devalued. In 1950, gold and foreign exchange holdings amounted to a measly $274 million. Today, they're 20 times that, and the Bundesbank has had to scotch reports that the mark would be revalued upward.

SOMETHING TO REMEMBER

By exporting capital, by letting the World Bank use its extra reserves, Germany not only shares the rich man's burden, but mitigates America's stigma of being the great and dominant dispenser of funds to underdeveloped nations. By doing this through the World Bank, West Germany guards against partisan political determination of where its money will go. Loans become multinational, rather than national.

This success story is something to remember as we balance the credits and debits in the postwar struggle of political systems. A strong Germany constitutes an enduring triumph of American foreign-aid policy. It is far more significant than the noisy though more dramatic demonstration which kept President Eisenhower from going to Japan.

TIME FOR A DECISIONMAKER

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, in the Evening Star of August 9, 1960, there appeared an article by Constantine Brown entitled "Time for a Decisionmaker." It is an extremely appropriate article regarding the problems of today and those we will face in the immediate future. I ask unanimous consent that this article be printed in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TIME FOR A DECISIONMAKER—FATE OF UNITED STATES HELD DEPENDENT ON ABILITY OF NEXT PRESIDENT TO ACT AGAINST REDS

(By Constantine Brown)

At no time in our history has the American electorate had to make a more momentous and careful decision than this year.

Much will be said the next few months over the airwaves, in print, and at whistle-stop speeches about the dire needs of the country. Emphasis will be laid on the necessity of catching up with the Russians in science (hence much more Federal money for education and school facilities); the needs of our senior citizens; difficulties of the farmers; and, of course, the international situation which the administration proclaims as satisfactory while the opposition claims the contrary.

Our future in the 1960's depends not on what platforms contain, or on the promises to an often gullible electorate, but on the strongmindedness of the man who will become our Chief Executive in these tragic and confused years. The man himself, not the platform, is all-important.

More than ever in our history the future of the United States and a large segment of the shrinking free world will depend on resolute decisions to be taken by the President himself. For in the next few years we shall be faced with this Republic's greatest threat from international communism, unless we abdicate our ideals of freedom for which we have fought three major wars in four decades, and accept coexistence on the Russian-Chinese pattern.

Our determined enemies are closing in on us more rapidly. The Iron Curtain, which in the past was thousands of miles away, is now at our doorstep. Within less than 100 miles from our shores Cuba has become a satellite state controlled not only by the Castro kids but also by their advisers from the Soviet Union, Czechoslovakia, and Communist China.

Last Sunday Fidel Castro announced the confiscation of practically all American property in Cuba—property which in the past has contributed so much to the welfare of the island.

There has been some Communist infiltration of Latin America since the last war when we pressed the governments of our sister republics to recognize the Kremlin dictatorship. But it is only since we, with reckless shortsightedness, helped Castro come to power that a Communist political and military base has been established dangerously close to our own shores.

Even the perennial optimists in the State Department and some segments of the news media admit now that there have been arrangements made between the clique in Havana and Moscow for either submarine or missile bases on the island. Raul Castro's statement that Cuba will accept Russia's military assistance is not being passed over as "youthful oratory" any longer. It has shocking substance.

Unless a strong hand is adopted forthwith under the leadership of the United States, there is a real danger that in the months (not years) to come, the Iron Curtain will descend over other Latin American countries.

It should be realized that smaller and weaker countries cannot adopt strong measures; if they do, they run the risk of being called aggressors. The initiative for preserving freedom must come from the United States. And we have been, to put it mildly, negligent in this respect. We have also developed a strange conception about dictatorships; the anti-Communists were described as pernicious while those who had imbibed the Communist ideology received our embrace. The Far East—especially southern Asia—is equally dangerous, but only if the enemy relies on hesitation and indecision by our President.

Our people have been terrorized into the belief that we have no defense if international communism goes on a war rampage and launches its missiles against us. It has been only in the last few months that the real reason that the Moscow-Peiping axis has not unleased a shooting war has been revealed: the real might of the American forces which can destroy all the important targets in the Soviet Union, while we may only be damaged.

But to make sure of this deterrent it is necessary that the President be a man of decision who would not have to listen to his brain trusters while the international kettle was boiling over. Unless such a man is in charge, international communism is bound to win by default.

ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF THE EISENHOWER ADMINISTRATION

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, an editorial appeared in a recent issue of Life magazine which I commend to my colleagues in the Senate.

It is entitled "People's Success Story," and it delineates with clarity, objectivity, and perspective the many accomplishments of the Eisenhower administration in domestic, international, and defense areas.

This impartial and penetrating exposition of Republican accomplishments over the past 7½ years should be read by all thinking Americans.

Mr. President, the editorial makes particular reference to our strong military posture which has prevented Communist aggression anywhere in the world and, in fact, has enhanced our prestige and power throughout the nations of the world.

The Life editorial further comments on the Eisenhower sound money policy, increases in new housing, the new highway system, our excellent space satellite program, and our Polaris submarine program—all major accomplishments in many and varied fields.

Its reference to such matters as fiscal responsibility, educational advances, medical progress, tolerance and understanding, which were all increased without Government interference or regulation point up the values of the American system of free enterprise, freedom, and liberty.

Mr. President, in view of the excellence of this editorial, I ask unanimous consent to have it printed in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PEOPLE'S SUCCESS STORY—THE EISENHOWER ERA MADE POSSIBLE THE MUCH GREATER ACHIEVEMENTS OF THE PEOPLE

In Chicago, where he won it from Bob Taft in the acrid battle of 1952, Dwight D. Eisenhower this week surrendered the leadership of the Republican Party. The record of his administration may be only one major campaign issue, since both NIXON and KENNEDY are bound to emphasize new goals and policies for a new age. But Eisenhower's record is well worth inspection.

Of the many flaws the Democrats will find in it, historians will probably agree at least on one. There is some substance to the charge that Ike has rather reigned than ruled. He has tended to assume, as you can in the Army but not in the White House, that an order once given is self-executing; a certain lack of followthrough has marred some of his best intentions, notably the rejuvenation of the Republican Party. He has been an easy boss. But that is not to echo the commoner (and mistaken) charge that he does not make decisions. Ike has made plenty of decisions. And most of them were right.

The duty he saw in taking office was to heal the wounds of 20 years of highly partisan government and chronic emergency. It was his genius to give the latent unity and goodwill of the American people a chance to recover and grow. He has been the least "divisive" of modern Presidents—and the most widely beloved.

Reinhold Niebuhr, no conservative, said Ike "rebuilt American conservatism into a viable political instrument." He gave a suspicious generation the reassuring experience of living safely and prosperously under a Republican government again—salutary for the people and for the Republican Party, too.

Such a government had to do more correcting than innovating. In our foreign alliances, Ike's long suit, he has preserved and developed previous lines of U.S. policy, but to them he has made two contributions of enormous importance.

The first was to modernize and strengthen our military posture and bring it into the missile era on a long-pull basis—i.e., no more crash emergency programs or budgetary zigs and zags. Though there is room for marginal argument, the essential truth is that when Ike leaves office, America will still be, as he found it, the strongest military power in the world.

President Eisenhower's second contribution was to rob the Communists of their most insidious propaganda weapon, Khrushchev's pretended guardianship of world peace. Ike personally shot down that phony Picasso peace dove. He did it by his personal dedication to peace, by his atoms-for-peace offer to the U.N., by his dramatic open-skies proposal at Geneva in 1955, by stopping the Suez war, by his serious pursuit of disarmament and by his goodwill travels. He has made the cause of peace so much his own that Jim Farley, only the other day, could accuse him of "peace-at-any-price leadership." That charge won't wash. Ike has twice faced down Communist threats of war in the Formosa Strait. He has not flinched under Russian pressure on Berlin. He took bold action in the Middle East. He has kept the peace without surrendering any point of strength. The Russian empire is no larger than it was in 1952 (in fact smaller by eastern Austria). The Chinese empire, though larger by North Vietnam and Tibet, is surrounded by stronger and more alert free neighbors than it was before Ike and John Foster Dulles took charge.

Ike used to be called a lucky President. His luck has run out lately at Sverdlovsk, Paris, and Tokyo. But let not these setbacks be confused with flaws in the solid structure of allied political, military, and economic strength built in the Eisenhower era.

The economic performance has been especially spectacular. Abroad, the Eisenhower policies have encouraged a rebirth of private trade and investment that has lifted the whole Western World and parts of Asia to amazing levels of prosperity. Europe has never been in healthier shape. We still need a new approach to the underdeveloped Southern Hemisphere, but even Latin America has improved politically, if not economically, in Ike's time.

At home the case is open and shut. The Eisenhower economic policy has been virtually a textbook model of how to befriend and stimulate a free-market system. He and his aides have handled two recessions with precise skill. Real wages and consumption have risen steadily, and profits and savings have remained healthy. He has led a tireless war on excessive government spending which has at last brought inflation under control. The $1.1 billion surplus announced last week is a symbol of this victory for a sound dollar.

Ike's government has helped finance the building industry while it set an alltime record of 8 million new homes in less than 8 years. It has launched a whole new highway system, 23 space satellites and 20 atomic submarines. It has expanded the union by two new States and created seaports on the Great Lakes.

Ike's government has maintained, not without difficulty, a high standard of integrity in Federal officeholders. His Cabinet has seen some stellar performers (Dulles, Brownell, Rogers, Anderson, Mitchell, et al.) and even the unfortunate Benson deserves respect for his persistent attack on Congress' scandalous farm policy.

Ike's government has appointed more scores of good judges than any previous one. This great improvement in the judiciary, essential to the Nation, is the kind of achievement to which voters and political writers give too little heed.

Ike's government has shifted the rate of Negro political and economic progress into high gear.

But all these achievements are only part of the great story of progress in the Eisenhower era. In a nation with a constitutional government, where freedom to act is left to individuals and unofficial groups, a full evaluation must include credit or blame for how the nation as a whole behaves. The greatest deeds of his era are what the people, responsive to their renewed liberty, have done for and by themselves.

Democrats charge that Ike's preoccupation with the budget has "starved" our public services. Yet total public spending—Federal, State, and local—is nearly twice what it was in Truman's time and most of the increase has been in welfare (nondefense) services. Of our school system, so rightly under scrutiny, an impressive fact is how it has grown in teachers, classrooms, and students, with little Federal aid. But even more important: scholastic standards have risen sharply.

Not Federal but private and local spending have changed our urban skylines these light 8 years; and distributed more books and music than ever; and produced more goods and services of every kind. The Federal Government did not develop automation, nor discover the Salk vaccine, nor make American architecture a new wonder of the world; nor cause more Americans to travel abroad than ever before; nor double the anual gifts to higher education; nor raise our birth rate to a record height. The American people did all these—and more. They did them under the benign and permissive Eisenhower "sun."

A certain dissatisfaction has crept into the last months of the Eisenhower era—the antitailfin syndrome, the Puritan nostalgia, the hunger for new national purpose. And that is healthy, for it shows that Americans have not been entirely corrupted by their own success. But let's face it; it is success, not failure, that causes our unease. Ike leaves us reunited, rested, self-enriched, and newly appreciative of our liberty. As a people we are (or should be) firmly prepared for our next testing. The Kennedy-or-Nixon era will be different. It may be grim or it may be great. It can scarcely be more sunny or fruitful than these Eisenhower years, in which so many age-old visions of the good life first became real.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant at Arms will execute the order of the Senate.

After a little delay Mr. ALLOTT, Mr. ANDERSON, Mr. BARTLETT, Mr. BEALL, Mr. BENNETT, Mr. BIBLE, Mr. BRIDGES, Mr. BUTLER, Mr. BYRD of Virginia, Mr. CANNON, Mr. CARLSON, Mr. CARROLL, Mr. CASE of New Jersey, Mr. CHAVEZ, Mr. COTTON, Mr. CURTIS, Mr. DOUGLAS, Mr. DWORSHAK, Mr. EASTLAND, Mr. FONG, Mr. FREAR, Mr. FULBRIGHT, Mr. GOLDWATER, Mr. GORE, Mr. HARTKE, Mr. HUMPHREY, Mr. JACKSON, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. KERR, Mr. KUCHEL, Mr. LONG of Hawaii, Mr. LONG of Louisiana, Mr. LUSK, Mr. MAGNUSON, Mr. MCCARTHY, Mr. MCGEE, Mr. MORSE, Mr. MORTON, Mr. MUNDT, Mr. MURRAY, Mr. PASTORE, Mr. PROUTY, Mr. PROXMIRE, Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. SALTONSTALL, Mr. SCHOEPPEL, Mr. SCOTT, Mr. SMATHERS, Mrs. SMITH, Mr. SYMINGTON, Mr. TALMADGE, Mr. THURMOND, Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware, Mr. YARBOROUGH and Mr. YOUNG of Ohio entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum is present.

MEETING OF COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE DURING SESSION OF THE SENATE

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. PASTORE] and other members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce are trying to conduct a hearing on all the House bills relating to payola and other problems connected with communications and television. I desire to have the Senate know that that is taking place. If quorum calls persist, we shall probably be late in coming to the Chamber. The committee is conducting very important business. It is seeking to complete the consideration of important matters during this session of Congress.

THE ANTARCTIC TREATY

The Senate resumed the consideration of Executive B (86th Cong., 2d sess.), the Antarctic Treaty, signed at Washington on December 1, 1959.

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. President, I move that the further consideration of the ratification of the Antarctic Treaty be postponed until January 25, 1961. The motion is made pursuant to the unanimous-consent agreement entered into by the Senate last night.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. How much time does the Senator from California yield himself?

Mr. ENGLE. I yield myself as much time as I may use of the 15 minutes under my control.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator may proceed.

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. President, I make the motion because I believe the new administration, which will take office in January, whether it be a Republican or a Democratic administration, should have the opportunity to consider this treaty. The new administration, which will have the responsibility of conducting the foreign policy of the Nation for 4 years, and possibly well into the next decade, should have the opportunity of passing upon the provisions of this important treaty.

I believe the new President of the United States should have an opportunity to express himself to the Senate with respect to the provisions of the treaty. I think the new Secretary of State, whoever he may be, likewise should have the same opportunity. Similarly, I believe the new Secretary of Defense should have that opportunity. The Senate ought to have the advice of those gentlemen in the new administration in acting upon this important treaty.

The treaty involves an area as big as the United States of America, plus all of Europe. For all practical purposes, the treaty disposes, in perpetuity, of the relationships of this Nation and other major nations to the vast continent of Antarctica.

I assert that we ought not to be required to vote upon this matter in the last days of this session under the pressures of time, and confronting, as we are, a new administration which will come into power the first of next year.

I think it would be important to know, for instance, whether whoever may become the Secretary of State, if he be on the Republican side, the successor to the present Secretary of State, Mr. Herter, would take the same attitude as Mr. Herter has taken with respect to the treaty. I have grave doubts as to whether Mr. Dulles, were he alive, would favor some of the provisions of the treaty.

I think it would be important to know whether, if a Democratic President is elected, the Democratic Secretary of State and the Democratic Secretary of Defense, who will have the responsibility of administering the foreign affairs and the military affairs of the Nation, will take precisely the same attitude toward all the provisions of the treaty. I say this because questions have been raised with reference to the intelligence of the treaty and with reference to whether or not it serves the best interests of the United States. What are some of those questions? Here are some of the questions which have been raised on the floor. Others will be raised before the debate is over.

Why are we admitting Russia to Antarctica on an equal footing with the United States and other nations which have a long history of activity and of claims in the Antarctic, when Russia has no claims whatsoever, except such tenuous claims as may be based upon the participation by the Soviet Union in the International Geophysical Year?

Have we thoroughly examined the alternatives to the treaty, alternatives which do exist, and among which are, as asserted by the distinguished senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] last night, the right of America to assert its claims in Antarctica, and the right of this Nation and the other nations which have good, standing claims in that area to try to adjust their differences and to agree upon the areas over which they, and each of them, hold sovereignty? Has there been a real examination of that kind of alternative?

What does the treaty give to Soviet Russia that which Soviet Russia does not have at present? I was impressed by the statement made by the Senator from Connecticut that the treaty was approved by Russia in 42 days. We know how the Russians negotiate when they do not want something. They negotiate like they negotiated in Korea. They negotiate like they have been negotiating in Warsaw. They negotiate like they have been negotiating at Geneva. But when they were offered an opportunity to get into Antarctica, with no sound basis whatsoever, they jumped at the opportunity and, of course, signed the treaty.

What reason do we have to believe that the Russians will abide by the terms of the treaty? What self-enforcing or self-executing provisions does the treaty contain to make certain that it will be enforced by the Russians, if it is ratified by the Senate of the United States?

Is it not true that the treaty gives to the Soviets the power of veto in Antarctica, just as the Soviets now hold a veto in the Security Council of the United Nations? Does the treaty have the effect, for all practical purposes, of abandoning our just claims based upon discovery in the Antarctic? I believe it does. It has been asserted on the floor that it does.

These are questions which ought to be carefully considered by the next administration.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, will the Senator from California yield?

Mr. ENGLE. I yield.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator from California has pointed out to the Senate some very significant and far-reaching commitments that the treaty would impose upon the United States if it is ratified. He has wisely moved that further consideration of the treaty be postponed until January of next year.

I should like to ask the Senator if it is not true that if Congress makes a mistake now in legislating, the next Congress, which will convene in January, can correct such a mistake in a matter of 3 or 4 days. If we should adopt a policy which is disapproved by the majority of the people in the November elections, that policy could be reversed within a few days after the convening of Congress in January.

However, if the U.S. Senate, acting under its constitutional duty to consent to treaties, makes a mistake and ratifies the pending treaty, the United States will be committed for 30 years and cannot honorably extricate itself without the consent of 11 other nations, including Soviet Russia.

Mr. ENGLE. The distinguished Senator is 100 percent correct. The treaty provides by its terms that it cannot be modified or amended except by unanimous consent on the part of all the signatories. In other words, the Soviet Union would be in a position to veto any modification whatsoever. If we made a mistake in ratifying the treaty today, there would not be any way on earth to rectify that mistake; it could not be changed. In January the Congress could not do anything whatsoever about such a mistake, for then the Soviet Union would have the right of veto; and the treaty would run for almost half a century, without a possibility of any correction.

Mr. RUSSELL. Not only could the Soviet Union prevent the correction of such a mistake, but unanimous-consent action by the other signatories to the treaty could not correct a mistake without the consent of our principal opponent.

Mr. ENGLE. The Senator is correct. There would be no way to change the situation, no matter what the new Secretary of Defense might say.

I think it might be well to find out the position of the Secretary of Defense. The Senator from Arkansas has referred to it; and I have heard rumors, too, that they have grave misgivings about this matter.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator from California yield?

Mr. ENGLE. In just a moment.

Mr. President, I think the new Secretary of Defense should have a chance to consider this matter. Although I have not been able to obtain any information on this subject—I read what the admiral said when he appeared before the committee; but he did not say very much—I have grave misgivings about the treaty.

If my motion is rejected, the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], the chairman of the Armed Services Committee, who also is opposed to the treaty, will subsequently address himself to it.

Now I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. As a result of the so-called rumors about the attitude of the Defense Department, yesterday evening, at 7:40, Admiral Burke—who certainly speaks, if anyone does, for the Navy Department—called me. He was very much disturbed about the rumors. He said there was nothing to the rumors. He said he is wholeheartedly behind the treaty. He said that it is possible that if we had followed some other policy since 1924, there might have been a different result, but that as of the moment he has no doubt that the treaty is in the national interest. And he said he regrets very much the statement—which had been made—that there was doubt about the attitude of the Defense Department.

Admiral Tyree spoke officially before the committee, for himself, as an admiral, and for the Defense Department. And I asked him about these rumors. In my opinion, these rumors originate with the opposition to the treaty, not with the responsible members of the Defense Department. And he went to great pains to point that out.

The Senator is very persuasive in referring to the possibility of making mistakes. But if the Senate rejects the treaty, it will also be a mistake that cannot be rectified.

Our Government initiated and negotiated, on its own initiative, this treaty. It has been 2 years in process. The committee reported it without dissent, although I believe there was one person who had doubts about it.

But in my opinion it would be even more serious to make the mistake the other way.

We have been telling all the world that we want inspection, along with Russia. But if the Senate rejected the treaty, such action would label us a complete fraud before all the world, as regards trying to make any kind of agreement with what may be called our antagonist.

Furthermore, the treaty is joined in by some of our principal friends.

But the idea that the Defense Department is opposed to the treaty or has reservations about it is, in my opinion, without any justification at all. I do not think Admiral Burke would call me up and make such statements, if that were true.

Someone said the State Department "beat the Defense Department over the head." That is nonsense; the State Department could not do that. The situation is more probably the other way around.

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. President, I cannot yield further; I have only 15 minutes. I appreciate the remarks of the Senator from Arkansas, for whom I have great respect.

But let me say that where there is so much smoke, there must be some fire; and I would certainly agree that it is better to postpone consideration of the treaty at this time, rather than to make a mistake either way in regard to it.

What earthly harm can result if this matter is postponed until January 25? At that time we shall have a new administration, a new President, a new Secretary of State, and a new Secretary of Defense. After January 25, there will be in those offices new officials who will have the responsibility of managing the affairs of the Nation for the next 4 years of the 30 years of the lifetime of the treaty.

Mr. President, in a matter as important as this one and as vital as this one to the welfare of the Nation, is it not important that we move on the basis of the best possible information we can get, and that we move under the advice of those who will have the responsibility of going forward with the execution of American foreign policy in the years ahead?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator from California yield?

Mr. ENGLE. I cannot yield at this time. If I obtain additional time, I shall yield. But at this time I wish to complete my remarks. After I complete them, if I have additional time, I shall be glad to yield.

Let me say that the administration now in power will not have the responsibility of operating under the terms of this treaty. The responsibility will be that of the new administration, in any case.

What I am saying is, not that we should make a mistake today, but that we should postpone until January 25 the further consideration of the treaty, and should give those who will have the responsibility of going forward at that time with American foreign policy, during the next few years, an opportunity to examine the treaty and advise the Senate regarding it, so the Senate will not make a mistake.

The treaty would last a long, long time. For all practical purpose it would determine in perpetuity what will happen in the only unoccupied and unclaimed continent on earth. So we certainly should take additional time in our consideration of the treaty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time available to the Senator from California has expired.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator from California yield?

Mr. ENGLE. I regret that the time available to me has expired.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, on behalf of the majority leader, I yield 1 minute to the Senator from Connecticut.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut is recognized for 1 minute.

Mr. BUSH. I wish to ask one question. First, let me say, incidentally, that the treaty was negotiated by a highly respected constituent of the Senator from California, Mr. Herman Phleger, of San Francisco.

The Senator from California has pointed out that Russia's eagerness to have the treaty go into effect is evidenced by the fact that within 40 or 45 days Russia approved the treaty; and it is said that that fact indicates that Russia has some interest in having the treaty go into effect.

However, I point out that in the absence of the treaty, Russia would be without limitation as regards the Antarctic. So would not our rights be better preserved by having Russia included among the signatories of the treaty, because the treaty will freeze the status quo as of today?

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me, to permit me to answer, let me say that at the present time there is no limitation on the operations of the Soviet Union in the Antarctic. When the Soviets went into the Antarctic during the International Geophysical Year, they squatted on an area which had been claimed for many, many years by Australia, and established their camps there. And they are still there.

My objection to this treaty is that it ties the hands of America. It demilitarizes the area. There would be nothing we could do about it if the Soviet Union moved in one of its satellites and established a military base. The satellite would not be bound by the treaty, but we would be bound not to put in a military base, even of a passive nature, even for the purpose of detection, not to mention for aggressive action. So it ties our hands. That is my objection to the treaty.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, how much time is left on this side?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Thirteen minutes.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield myself 3 minutes. Then I will yield the remainder of the time to the distinguished chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee.

Mr. President, there has been talk about what the attitude of the next administration will be. As the Senate knows, we have the next President of the United States in this Chamber, and, to the best of my knowledge, the nominees of both parties for the highest office in this land are in favor of the treaty. I am assuming that the Vice Presidential nominees of both parties are in favor of the treaty, and would so vote. Therefore, I think that the question of postponing the treaty on Antarctica to the next session is not germane to the question at this time. A vote to postpone, in my opinion, is a vote to kill.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield.

Mr. RUSSELL. Why would a motion to postpone be a motion to kill if both candidates to be the future President were to favor the treaty at the next session? We want to give them a chance to look at it in the objective atmosphere of a postelection period, rather than in the atmosphere of a political campaign and the pressures being brought to bear.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I can appreciate the sentiments expressed by the Senator from Georgia, for whom I have the greatest affection and respect.

Mr. RUSSELL. I can assure the Senator that feeling is reciprocated.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I thank the Senator.

It appears to me this is one of the very few measures which this rump session can consider with a great degree of objectivity. Perhaps it is the only measure which we can look at in that manner. But, I repeat, in my opinion—and it is just my opinion—a vote to postpone until a day certain in January next means that the purpose behind it is, in effect, to kill this treaty.

On the basis of what the Senator from California, for whom I have the greatest respect and affection, has said to the Senate, he is not in favor of the treaty. I may call to the attention of my colleagues the report by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee which accompanied this particular treaty, and I hope my colleagues will be able to read it. May I refer them to:

1. PURPOSES OF THE TREATY

Twelve countries are signatories of the treaty: the United States, the Soviet Union, and 10 other nations, including all 7 which have advanced territorial claims to Antarctica. Through the treaty, these countries accept the following objectives: the Antarctic Continent and surrounding areas shall be used exclusively for peaceful purposes; nuclear explosions and radioactive waste disposal shall be banned in the treaty area; no territorial claims or rights shall either be recognized or affected; freedom of scientific investigation shall be maintained—

That has been a big factor in that area, and shows that different nations, differing in outlook, can work together and can make contributions toward the common good—and international cooperation to that end promoted; and complete rights of unilateral inspection—

I emphasize "unilateral"— shall insure fulfillment of these objectives. The overall purpose thus is to neutralize Antarctica and obviate future conflicts between nations so that knowledge may be derived from the continent to benefit all mankind.

What greater objective could we have? Who started these negotiations?

In May 1958 the United States—

Our own country—

sent identical notes to each of the 11 other countries which participated in the Antarctic program of the International Geophysical Year (IGY) of 1957–58, inviting them to join in a conference aimed at formulating a treaty on Antarctica. In so doing, the United States was mindful of broadened interest in and claims to Antarctica by several countries, conflicts between Britain, Argentina, and Chile because of their overlapping claims, the refusal of the latter two nations to permit the question to be taken to the International Court of Justice, and the failure of U.S. efforts in 1948 to arrange a conference with the seven claimants looking toward a settlement of territorial interests. Added to these considerations was the fact that the U.S.S.R. had engaged in extensive activities during the IGY and had a number of bases in the Australian-claimed portion of Antarctica which it showed every intention of maintaining. The United States, therefore, was concerned lest the great benefits of international scientific cooperation derived from the IGY should end with the close of 1958, to be replaced by future national disputes and militant maneuvers. Friendly interest in such an endeavor, informally expressed by several projected treaty members, also stimulated U.S. adoption of the initiative.

All 11 governments accepted the U.S. invitation, and their representatives held extensive informal preparatory talks in Washington.

Deliberations covered a period of 6 weeks. Two of our most distinguished colleagues were participants in those deliberations, the distinguished Senator from Kansas [Mr. CARLSON], and the distinguished Senator from Wyoming [Mr. MCGEE]. They represented the Senate during the course of that 6-week period.

Some reference has been made about the stand of the Department of Defense. Rear Adm. David M. Tyree, Antarctic projects officer, appeared before the committee, representing the Department of Defense, and asserted it fully approved of this action.

Furthermore, one other individual, for whom we all have great respect, the Hon. Herman Phleger, who used to be a high official in the State Department under this administration, and who is a man of circumspection, great ability, and integrity, was the chairman of our delegation. He was looking after our interests, as were our colleagues, the Senators from Kansas and Wyoming, and all those associated with them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield myself one-half minute.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I should like to inform the distinguished Senator from Montana and the Senate that within 15 minutes I have personally talked with Mr. Gates, the Secretary of Defense. He stated, I can say affirmatively, that he, General Twining, Admiral Burke, and Mr. Douglas, are wholeheartedly in favor of the treaty; that the Chiefs of Staff and the civilian members of the Department of Defense feel that the treaty should be approved.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I yield my remaining time to the distinguished Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Montana has covered the major points very well. I believe it would be a great mistake to postpone action on the treaty. We have spent over 2 years on it. The committee has had full hearings. As a matter of fact, I tried to bring it up before the end of the regular session. The Senator from Illinois was party to those discussions. But because of the rush, it was decided to put it over, and it was agreed to bring it up at the beginning of the session. I thought there might be an impression that we were doubtful about it or intended to reject the treaty.

I do not know that this is the time to go into the merits of the treaty. In my opinion, all the talk about what might have been the situation, if we had not followed what is known as the Hughes Doctrine in 1924, is completely irrelevant to the present discussion. The fact is, we have followed it. We are confronted with a situation in which we and the Russians have followed the same policy—that is, nonrecognition of any claims. If we reverse that policy and abandon this treaty, I think we shall be primarily responsible for creating a very chaotic and dangerous situation.

Among the signatories to the treaty are some of the best and stanchest friends of this country. Five of the 12 countries have already ratified—the United Kingdom, Belgium, the Union of South Africa, Japan, and Norway. If we are going to be hesitant about our action, or reject the treaty, I think it will be a major disaster to our standing in international relations.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. With respect to the point made a little while ago in the colloquy, that we ought to defer the matter until we can consider it in a more objective atmosphere, is it not true that the invitations went out 25 months ago; that the 6 weeks' conference was held 10 months ago; that the treaty came to the committee at least a month before the national conventions, before the air was surcharged with certain political feelings?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. It came to us in February.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Thus it was reported well before that time.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. We were under no pressure at all. The treaty was reported very calmly, without any political implications. There are no politics involved in the treaty at all.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Will the Senator yield for one other point?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The Senator from California made the point that we should defer consideration because a new administration will come into power and it, insofar as a treaty is administered, will administer the treaty. Would that not be true with respect to every convention, every protocol, every treaty we have considered on the executive calendar throughout this session and the prior session as well?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The Senator is quite correct.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Is it not a fact that seven of the nations which, under international law, have proved claims on the basis of discoveries have become signatories to the proposed treaty?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Those nations have asserted claims. We have not recognized their claims, but all seven have asserted claims. Those nations have valid claims if we recognize them, and they have signed the treaty.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Two of the seven are the United Kingdom and Norway. Those countries have asserted claims and make the claim that they have the bases to support the claims, although they have ratified the treaty.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The Senator is quite correct. Those two countries, plus three others which have not asserted claims, have ratified. Those others are Belgium, Japan, and the Union of South Africa.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Neither the Soviet Union nor the United States has asserted a claim, yet these two countries have become signatories to the proposed treaty.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The Senator is correct.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Thus all the nations with potential claims—claims either asserted or capable of being asserted—have subscribed to the treaty.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. That is correct.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Two nations, the United Kingdom and Norway, which were very active in respect to discoveries, have asserted claims in accordance with international law.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The Senator is quite correct.

I thank the Senator for that clarification.

The Senator from California referred to the Soviet Union as having "squatted" on some land which I believe he said belonged to Australia. That brings up another aspect of the problem. As a matter of fact, the land where we have "squatted," one might say, belongs to New Zealand, if we recognize the traditional claims. If we recognize the claims which have been asserted under the usual procedures of discovery and occupation, that would be the case, although there has been such limited occupation that the old doctrine of discovery has not applied.

One of the principal reasons why the United States has refused to recognize the claims of these various countries is that the countries have failed to actually enter, to occupy, and to control these various areas. That is largely a legal matter.

The fact is that the best part of this area is the area to which New Zealand asserts a claim. That is McMurdo Sound and the Ross ice shelf. Even if we threw this overboard and asserted a claim to the now unclaimed area, which is some 20 percent of Byrd Land, according to the testimony before the committee that is the poorest, the least accessible, and the least desirable part of the entire area.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Arkansas has expired. All time for debate has expired.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. All time for debate has expired?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from California [Mr. ENGLE.]

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. President, on my motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Presiding Officer, for the information of the Senate, state the question before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from California [Mr. ENGLE] to postpone further consideration of the Antarctic Treaty until January 25, 1961.

On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MORSE (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the Senator from Alaska [Mr. GRUENING]. If he were present, he would vote "yea." If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay"; I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. SYMINGTON (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON]. If he were present, he would vote "yea." If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay"; I therefore withhold my vote.

The rollcall was concluded.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from Alaska [Mr. GRUENING], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. JORDAN], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY], and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN], are absent on official business.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARTKE], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER], and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] are necessarily absent.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS] is absent because of illness.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL] is absent because of a death in the family.

On this vote the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. JORDAN] is paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN]. If present and voting, the Senator from North Carolina would vote "yea," and the Senator from Alabama would vote "nay."

I further announce that if present and voting, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER] and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS] would each vote "nay."

Mr. KUCHEL. I announce that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CASE] are necessarily absent.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. MARTIN] is absent by leave of the Senate on official business. If present and voting, the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CASE] would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 56, as follows:

So Mr. ENGLE's motion was rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion of the Senator from California was rejected.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The treaty is before the Senate. Under the unanimous-consent agreement entered into, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] is in control of 2 hours of time for debate, and the balance of the time, 1½ hours, is under the control of the majority leader.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, ever since Gladstone wrote that the American Constitution is the most marvelous document to come from the mind and hand of man within a given period of time, the world has marveled at our system of checks and balances. Under our system of government, the primary responsibility for the initiation and, indeed, for the negotiation of foreign policy matters is vested in the executive branch of the Government. However, under the Constitution one of the most important of all the checks found in our Government, the responsibility that devolves upon the Senate is to consider and to give its consent to treaties with foreign powers, before such treaties become effective.

It was difficult in the early days of the Republic for the heads of foreign states to recognize this division of power. Often when treaties were signed, these foreign signatories accepted them as conclusive and binding upon the Government and the people of the United States.

Throughout the years it has become perfectly well understood, by even the most remote and primitive governments of the earth, that any treaty designed to bind this country over a period of years will not become effective until it has been approved by a two-thirds vote of the Senate. That is a heavy responsibility on the Senate. It is one that I hope the Senate will measure up to in the decision of the pending question.

In my judgment, it would be difficult to overstate the vital importance of the issues at stake in the decision that the Senate will soon make on the pending treaty. As I indicated earlier today when I interrupted the distinguished Senator from California [Mr. ENGLE], we shall have taken an irrevocable step, if the Senate ratifies the treaty.

That is not the case with respect to legislation. If we make a most grievous error in a legislative matter, Congress can correct that error in a matter of days. If we make a grievous error in a legislative matter, every 2 years the people of the country have an opportunity to give expression to their views on the subject. They can elect new representatives to come to Washington and rectify the error and to change the course of the policy affected.

That is not true with respect to treaties after they have the consent of the U.S. Senate. No matter how grave an error we might make in the case of this treaty, it would be impossible for us to extricate ourselves from the evil effects of the decision.

I realize that a grave responsibility rests today upon the United States as a leader in world affairs. I realize the necessity for leaning over backward to generate the support of the other free nations of the earth in the great cause that is now at issue between the forces of freedom, led by the United States, and the forces of tyranny and repression over free men, represented by the Soviet Union.

Although we must be attuned to international interests and to global considerations, I hope the day has not come when the safety and the welfare of the United States will not be the primary concern to every Member of Congress. It is in that light that I have undertaken to measure the proposed treaty against what I regard as the primary interest of the American people.

By that yardstick, I have come to the considered opinion that the treaty clearly fails to meet the test of the national interest. Indeed, I find that the treaty is diametrically opposed to the best interests of this Nation and the future of our people.

I do not desire to restate all the matters that have been so ably brought to the attention of the Senate over the past several days. I am proud to be associated with the distinguished Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DODD], the distinguished Senator from California [Mr. ENGLE], the distinguished Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND], and others Senators who have spoken on the floor of the dangers that are in the treaty and who have implored the Senate not to take hasty action upon it.

In the last analysis the treaty, as I see it, represents a surrender of American rights, of American interests, and of the future security of America in a vital area of the world as large as the United States and Europe combined. I realize it is all too true that those rights have not been asserted by the Department of State. Nevertheless, I say it comes with poor grace for the Department to come to the Senate and to cite its own laches, its own negligence in asserting the claim, as a reason for the Senate to ratify their surrender of it.

Mr. President, the treaty would give to the Soviet Union a role equal to ours in the use, the control, and the development of the vast Antarctic area. That is true notwithstanding a total absence of any legitimate Russian rights and of any legitimate interest in that continent.

The proposal before us completely reverses the historic roles that Russia and the United States have played in the Antarctic. The United States has been more active than any other nation—indeed, than all the other nations—in its explorations and discoveries in that area. Yet, it is proposed by the treaty that we completely abandon those rights, rights that are superior to those of all the other nations who claim rights, merely because of the timidity that has seized the Department of State since the end of World War II. I do not make that statement in a partisan sense. It has not been only this administration that has neglected to assert our claims.

As a matter of fact, so far as is known, Russia had never set foot upon the continent of Antarctica prior to the time she took part in the activities of the International Geophysical Year in 1956. Yet we have before us the preposterous proposal that the Soviet Union be invited into Antarctica on terms of equality with us. This is in the light of our record of 150 years of exploration, navigation, and discovery that has resulted in the expenditure of more than 250 million American dollars and the loss of several American lives. Thus we have laid the predicate for claims which, in all other periods of human history, have been considered as adequate to support claims to sovereignty. Yet in the light of that disparity of real interest in the Antarctic area we are asked to approve a treaty whereby the United States will give away all the benefits that should accrue to us as a result of our activities. In other words, we would give away all and gain nothing, while the Soviet Union would give nothing and gain all.

No fair-minded person could quarrel with the expressed objectives of the treaty.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield, or does he prefer not to yield until he has concluded his address?

Mr. RUSSELL. It does not matter. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. With respect to the matter of our giving away all and gaining nothing, is it not true that about 80 percent of the claims are made by countries other than the Soviet Union, most of whom, I believe, are friendly to the United States?

Mr. RUSSELL. I shall deal with that subject. That is why we should consider some other way to settle this matter. After I have concluded my criticism of the treaty, I shall present my alternative. This is not a purely negative position on my part. I shall point out how I believe we should proceed to settle the claims if the Senate rejects the treaty. I prefer to proceed in the order in which I have my presentation arranged.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. If the Senator from Georgia does not wish to yield, that is quite all right.

Mr. RUSSELL. Oh, yes; I am not here simply to condemn the treaty without presenting an alternative. I think the treaty is to be condemned. I think it is subject to condemnation. However, I shall go further and propose what I believe is a far superior program for the settlement of the conflicting claims to Antarctica.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I shall be much interested in the Senator's remarks in regard to this point. The Antarctic is claimed by a number of friendly nations. Seven of them that have signed the treaty have claims to the Antarctic. Among the 12 who have signed the treaty, 5 have ratified it, and 2 are among the principal claimants. Is that not so?

Mr. RUSSELL. That is what I referred to earlier when I said the State Department was depending on its own negligence in not asserting rights that belong to the American people. The State Department says that Americans explored and discovered this area; the Department concedes that. The State Department says that at one time or another American citizens explored and discovered more than four-fifths of the continent; but as a matter of fact, other nations have claimed most of the continent. In most instances those nations filed their claims after the American explorations that gave our country title to that area.

It is almost like the overflight issue. The State Department says we must have the right to overfly the Antarctic. I have no doubt that Russia would be glad to sign a treaty with us that would authorize both the United States and Russia to overfly Arkansas. It would be about as ridiculous to claim that as a great achievement as to claim that our representatives have made a great achievement in negotiating this treaty.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. With respect to the prejudice in regard to the State Department——

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator from Arkansas may call it a prejudice if he wishes to do so.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. But is it not true that the unalterable policy of the United States since 1924 has been not to assert any claim to the Antarctic?

Mr. RUSSELL. No, that is not a fact.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Is not that true?

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator from Arkansas is relying on the old Hughes declaration, and the Senator has succeeded in drawing me away from the remarks I wish to make.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Then I apologize; I regret that I asked the Senator from Georgia to yield.

Mr. RUSSELL. But I shall undertake to show that the Hughes declaration, on which the Senator from Arkansas relies, has been as dead as Russia's claim to the Antarctic ever since 1939.

Mr. President, this treaty might have some justification if we were dealing exclusively with friendly nations who were as good as their word. But in addition to the fact that we are inviting Russia to share our claims to this great area, we are relying altogether on Russia's promises and Russia's pledges for the consummation of this treaty. Every person of intelligence in this country knows that Russia is a ruthless, conscienceless, atheistic, Communist society whose pledges are absolutely worthless, and are used only to achieve an end, without any intention of being honored.

I am not willing to place any trust or reliance, in surrendering America's valid rights, on the pledged word of Russia; and I am not willing to vote to commit this country to what I regard as a most one-sided international agreement, even though it originated in our own State Department.

The Senator from Arkansas says that position is just a matter of prejudice against the State Department. Some of us who are objecting to this treaty think that those who are supporting it are doing so on the basis of an unquestioning faith in the State Department. In the discharge of my obligation to participate in the exercise by the Senate of its responsibility in the ratification of treaties, I believe it my duty to approach that task without blind faith in the State Department. I believe it my obligation to use my best judgment in the interest of the people of the United States. Certainly that is the duty of every Member of the Senate.

This treaty would certainly be a dismal conclusion to one of the brightest and proudest chapters of American history. I refer to the history of the exploration and discovery of the mysterious and vast frozen expanses of Antarctica. I shall not recount here in detail the dramatic story of the dangers and hardships that have been encountered by the daring and brave men who have sailed under the American flag and have conquered the vast expanses of the ice-covered continent of the Antarctica. We know that since the early 1800's Americans have been in this area, and have been more active there than have the citizens of any other nation. We undertook official explorations there as early as 1838. We sent Lt. Charles Wilkes there to make sightings and maps. It was alleged that he had not been there, and I believe he was court-martialed or was subjected to some kind of inquiry. But all the maps made by later explorations have demonstrated that Wilkes was there; there was no other way by which he could have known the outline of the continent that he so accurately depicted in his maps.

The greatest period of U.S. activity there, and one of the most extensive explorations, began in 1928, under the command of the renowned Adm. Richard Evelyn Byrd. Except during the war years, the United States has been engaged since that time in almost continuous scientific exploration of the Antarctic area. We have had the physical presence there of citizens of the United States in official capacities, representing the people of the United States.

The names of those great explorers are familiar to the American people, and have been recounted here again and again by other Senators who have discussed this subject.

The most recent activities were preparatory to, and in conjunction with, the International Geophysical Year; and 11 other nations, including the Soviet Union, participated in those scientific investigations during the Geophysical Year. Those 12 nations are the ones that participated in drafting this treaty.

I should like to point out that when the State Department sent out its note inviting the presence of those nations, it outlined the rights and interests of our Nation, which the State Department had never formally asserted before the world. I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD an excerpt from the American note of May 2, 1958, which states that for years we have continued to have direct and substantial rights and interests in the Antarctic, commencing with the early 1800's.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The United States for many years has had, and at the present time continues to have, direct and substantial rights and interests in Antarctica. Throughout a period of many years commencing in the early 1800's, many areas of the Antarctic region have been discovered, sighted, explored, and claimed on behalf of the United States by nationals of the United States and by expeditions carrying the flag of the United States. During this period, the Government of the United States and its nationals have engaged in well-known and extensive activities in Antarctica.

In view of the actiivties of the United States and its nationals referred to above, my Government reserves all of the rights of the United States with respect to the Antarctic region, including the right to assert a territorial claim or claims.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, instead of asserting our claims, as the other nations have done, the State Department says we have only reserved our rights. The State Department reserved them until, under this treaty, it proposes to put them in cold storage in perpetuity. If that happens there will be no way on earth ever to assert them. If the Senate votes to ratify this treaty, the $250 million of the tax funds of the American people and the sacrifices made by the brave Americans who gave their lives in that area to establish American rights and American claims would be effectively wiped out.

Mr. President, I say the Soviet Union has done nothing whatever to deserve the enticing plum we are obligingly offering the Soviet Union in this treaty.

Eleven other nations are participating. Some of them have claims. The Senator from Arkansas refers to a conflict between their claims and our claims there. as a factual matter, there already is a great conflict of claims in this area, between other nations. I fully agree that those claims should be settled. However, our State Department proposes to settle them, not by asserting our claims, but by surrendering them. That is what I oppose here. I oppose settling our claims by any process of surrender, instead of using the ways that normally are used by nations.

The main effect of this treaty is to freeze indefinitely the existing status of sovereign claims in Antarctica. That, of course, is tailored for the benefit of the Russians, who have no claim of any kind dated any earlier than 1956; but they came into this meeting, when they responded to our invitation, with the old Russian claim of being first in everything. They have given out the propaganda that a Russian first invented the airplane; that a Russian first invented the telephone; that a Russian first invented the radio. In the same way they now claim that in 1820 Admiral Billingshausen was the first to discover Antarctica. We ratify this treaty, and the Russians will move in and say, "All right, we have signed up in Antarctica for a common administration. Now let us go to the Arctic and sign up for a common administration there." We will find they are making a claim that an "Admiral Vonkisky" had been in the Arctic long before any American, any British, any French, any Dane, any Norwegian, or any other explorer who might have asserted a claim there.

If we ratify this treaty, if we persist in refusing to assert a just and valid claim of primary rights in Antarctica for future generations of Americans, we will have lost those rights. Russia has made some tenuous claims there, in the same category with the claims that a Russian discovered radio and so forth. The palpable unfairness of this treaty to future generations of American citizens is shocking to me, and I cannot ratify, by my vote, any such unusual advantage to Russia, to which I do not think she is entitled.

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes; I yield.

Mr. DWORSHAK. I have a very high regard for the legislative capabilities of the Senator from Georgia. Serving on the Committee on Appropriations with him, I usually find myself in general agreement with his judgment and his conclusions, but I want to point out that in the deliberations of the Appropriations Committee, frequently a controversy arises, and very often there is not complete unanimity on some of the very vital issues.

Mr. RUSSELL. There very seldom is, I may say to the Senator.

Mr. DWORSHAK. That is the reason why I rise to ask a question. Is it not somewhat peculiar that the Foreign Relations Committee, made up of 11 Democrats and 6 Republicans, should report this treaty favorably, urging ratification, with not a single member of that very important committee presenting a divergent viewpoint? I am somewhat at a loss and somewhat in a dilemma to know whether, on one side, we can rely upon the composite judgment and the recommendations of the 17 members of the Foreign Relations Committee, which reported the treaty without a single dissenting vote or recommendation, when at the same time my good friend from Georgia is pointing out some very salient factors involved in this treaty. It is difficult for me to understand why we do not have a more thorough explanation of this treaty by the members of the Foreign Relations Committee.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator knows that often the Appropriations Committee, and the Foreign Relations Committee, and other committees report matters that have not been unanimously approved and without any minority views being filed. I do not believe that all the members of the Foreign Relations Committee are supporting this treaty. As a matter of fact, I know that they are not unanimously supporting it.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The Senator from Idaho has stated that there had been no explanation of the treaty, or no adequate explanation. First of all, I should like to say that there has been an adequate explanation of it, but none of the statements have been made by those who have the prestige of the distinguished Senator from Georgia. If the Senator will read the RECORD, he will find there has been an explanation of this matter made in the RECORD. We all know of the respect we have for the Senator from Georgia. I rarely find myself in disagreement with him, because I have great respect for him and confidence in his committee recommendations. I only regret that he does not have a similar confidence for the measures reported by the Foreign Relations Committee.

Mr. RUSSELL. That is not an accurate statement.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The fact that he is speaking has caused the largest representation I have seen on the Senate floor during this discussion. That is one reason why I hope he will allow questions, so we may develop this matter, because I am quite sure that when he sits down and leaves, Members of the Senate will have more important places to go to, and we shall have no opportunity to develop the matter.

It has been said that about the only thing we have done in the area affected by the treaty is carrying on scientific investigation. We have mined no minerals. We have drilled no oil wells. We have taken nothing out of the area. This whole area is covered by an average of a mile of ice. It is important for scientific experiments. That is what has gone on. But is it not a fact that if we asserted exclusive jurisdiction over some 20 percent of the area, then the other nations would do likewise, and we would be excluded from 80 percent of the area; whereas, under this treaty, we have the right to go anywhere, at anytime, in the whole area? It is not as one sided as the Senator feels it is. The Senator is not seeking to leave the impression with the Senate, I hope, that we should assert our rights to the whole area. He does not think there is any possibility of that, does he?

Mr. RUSSELL. In the first place, let me say that some have taken the position that the area is completely worthless. I do not share that opinion. I say that without any reflection on the Foreign Relations Committee. I think the Senator said that I am always in disagreement with the Foreign Relations Committee. That is not correct. I regret I must disagree with my friend. I have great respect for his many great capabilities, particularly in this area. But I shall not close my mind—I could not if I tried—to the considerations in a matter of this kind and fail to form an opinion of my own. I regard it to be my duty as a Senator of the United States to express my own views even though they may run counter to those of others.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I did not intend to assert that the Senator should do anything different.

Mr. RUSSELL. I do think, with due deference and respect to the Senator, that is the duty of a Senator of the United States.

I realize that there are going to be conflicting claims in that area, but some of the area has not been claimed by anyone, and the Senator said today it is completely worthless. I do not think it is. There is Marie Byrd Land. The reason claims have not been made is that several nations have a hesitancy about asserting claims until the United States has asserted a claim. They cannot understand why the United States has not asserted some claim in this area. In this atomic age, when someone may develop a means, such as by atomic power, to burn off some of that icecap, one could not say that that area is completely worthless.

I do not wish, Mr. President, to have history put me in the position of that unfortunate Commissioner of Patents who said in the 1880's that the Patent Office ought to be abolished because men had already discovered everything that could possibly be known. I think we shall find out a great deal more about the Antarctic area in the days to come. I shall deal with its strategic value in a military way in the course of my remarks.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question about melting the ice cap?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The Senator from Washington, who was recently in the Antarctic——

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, will the Senator please speak louder?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The Senator from Washington [Mr. JACKSON], the new chairman of the Democratic National Committee, was on the floor of the Senate yesterday, and discussed with me this question, and said that it had been stated we might melt the ice cap, and he said that the ice cap in places is 10,000 or 12,000 feet deep. He said, "If we melt the ice cap it will raise the level of the Pacific Ocean some 100 feet and submerge most of the State of Washington." He also said he did not think he would be in favor of that, and that the submerging might well include many other areas. He said he had been in the area and had discussed the matter with scientists, and that such a proposal was a wholly unrealistic proposal.

I should like to invite the attention of the Senate to the testimony of Dr. Laurence M. Gould, chairman of the Committee on Polar Research of the National Academy of Sciences. This distinguished geologist and explorer was second in command of the first Byrd expedition. He is one of the leading scientists in this country in regard to Antarctic matters. He states in no uncertain terms, very positively, that except for its scientific value he cannot see that this land has any commercial value whatever. He says it is valuable to the United States only as a scientific area. Therefore, by retaining and obtaining the right to go all over the land, as we do under the treaty, in contrast to having an exclusive right to a small part—which is generally said would be some 20 percent if we should assert a claim—he thinks, and most people think, it is of far more value to have the right to use the whole area for scientific purposes than to have a small area for any possibility of melting the ice cap.

I ask the Senator how the United States is going to melt the ice cap if the United States owns only a small amount of the area. Are we going to melt the ice cap owned by everybody else?

If that should be a feasible procedure to follow, it is much more likely to be done under an arrangement where the land is internationalized and all the various claimants are in agreement, than if we had only a small segment of the area for ourselves.

All that the Senator's proposal would result in is a Balkanization of the area, where no one could do anything but war about it, assuming the land ever became valuable.

Mr. RUSSELL. I was going to say that a little Balkanization, with a Balkanized part of it under the flag of the United States, is better than putting 100 percent of the area under the veto of the Soviet Union. I prefer the former.

Mr. President, the Senator has cited with great satisfaction the testimony of Dr. Laurence M. Gould, who, as the Senator stated, was the chairman of the Committee on Polar Research of the National Academy of Sciences. Dr. Gould testified: "I would not give a nickel for all the mineral resources I know in Antarctica." However, in the same statement, and in the very next breath, the good doctor said: "We have not examined 1 percent of the area geologically."

I simply think that we ought to have a little better basis for our determination before we accept the view that this land is worthless and therefore we can give it away to Russia very freely. I assure the Senator that militarily this is not true.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Some years ago many people did not think that one could drill an oil well in the ocean or in the sea. Once oil was found under the water, off the shores, the oil people found that they could go out into hundreds of feet of water and could build platforms which would withstand the worst tornadoes, as well as waves coming in 30 or 40 feet high, and still produce oil. The Federal Government, with its great resources, by a great effort, went in to throw the States out of the area and to exclude them from oil development, after the oil was found.

The Senator knows that the test, so far as mineral resources are concerned, is that until one has explored there is no reason on earth to assume one acre of land is any better than any other acre of land anywhere on earth. Any oil company which is taking leases will lease "wildcat acreage" without even taking a seismograph on the land.

There is every reason to assume, since there is such a vast amount of area in Antarctica, that some values may be discovered. I assume the Senator will cover that point later on.

The Senator no doubt knows that we are paying as much as $20 million a year for a single small location, for the right to have a tracking station to track missiles. Under the treaty we would give up the right to put such a station on property in this area.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator is correct. This clearly shows the folly of casually discounting resources in this vast area. What reason is there to believe that this vast continent, larger than the United States and Europe combined, contains absolutely no valuable resource of any kind? It would certainly be the only continent of its kind upon the earth if it were completely worthless, as some of the witnesses would have us believe.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield before he passes on to another subject, since he has mentioned the Russian veto and that we could not do anything about a veto?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I should like to invite the Senator's attention to the statement of Mr. Phleger, who negotiated this treaty, as shown on page 56 of the hearings. I know all Senators have copies of the hearings before them.

Mr. Phleger was asked by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER] about the veto of the Russians, and he said:

> Senator, we were very careful in drafting this treaty to see that no right granted by the treaty was subject to any approval by any other party in order to be exercised, and there is a provision in this that the consultative body which can recommend and propose and whose proposals are only effective if universally accepted, is not applicable to the rights given by the treaty.
> For instance the right of inspection can be exercised without anybody's consent, the right to go anywhere in Antarctica, the right to engage in scientific inquiry, the right to appoint observers; all of those rights are unilateral rights that require no consent by anyone.

This is one of the valuable parts of the treaty. I do not think it is fair to say that we cannot do anything because of a Russian veto, or without Russian approval. This is an important part of the treaty. We can do all of these things without approval by anybody.

Mr. RUSSELL. Does the Senator believe that the United States could move in, if mineral deposits were found there today, and take them out to any extent it desired, without the consent of the other parties?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. No. I asked the witness specifically about that matter. The question of who owns the mineral rights is not settled by the treaty at all.

Mr. RUSSELL. That is correct.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Those rights are not settled now. We have no claim to one ounce, or to one foot of mineral rights in Antarctica. We have not asserted any claim. If we should assert any, immediately everybody else's rights would come into effect, and we would thereby exclude ourselves, ipso facto, from all the other parts of the area which the other nations claim.

I am talking about all of Antarctica, that great land.

This is not all one sided, as the Senator presents it to us. We have now maintained the status quo, as the Senator has stated, with respect to the rights which are not asserted and with respect to the mineral rights, if they should ever develop. That matter will have to be settled by future negotiations, exactly as it would have to be settled in any case.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. This treaty would not change that situation at all.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I shall not be able to follow the arrangement I had hoped to follow in presenting my remarks today. The Senator compels me at this stage of the proceedings to refer to what I regard as being one of the fatal defects in the treaty. The Senator refers to the limitations imposed upon the United States and the other signatories to the treaty.

One of my objections to the treaty is that it can lead to utter confusion in Antarctica. The fact is that we assert no claim. The other parties, while they do not definitely waive their claims, do not assert them under the treaty. There are 12 nations, out of the 80 nations on earth, which are signatories and which would be bound, but the other nations on earth could go to Antarctica and locate to their hearts' content. They could assert claims to any extent they desired to assert claims, and who would stop them? Who would put them out? We have tied our hands.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I must say that the discussion of the Senator from Georgia surely is one that is needed, because this is a far-reaching treaty. I have no doubt about that. I sat through most of the hearings on this treaty. The question of claims was discussed at length by members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, both during the testimony and in our informal, private discussions.

Mr. Phleger, who was the chief negotiator, former counsel of the State Department, and a man of competence in that field of law, stated in his testimony on page 39 of the transcript of the hearing relating to these claims:

> I might mention for a moment that the basis, it seems to me, of the objections to this treaty which we have just heard, are based on a failure to understand or recognize the provisions of the treaty itself.
> The provision of the treaty with respect to claims does not relinquish in one iota any claim or basis of claim of the United States of America. It is so stated categorically. Nor does it pretend, nor would it be realistic to expect the other claimants to relinquish their claims, so that the legal status quo now existing with all of the rights or basis of rights or claims of the United States are preserved and nothing is relinquished by the United States.

A little earlier he pointed out that—

> The United States has not asserted any claim to territorial sovereignty in Antarctica. Nor has the United States recognized any claims made by others there, but has consistently reserved all of its rights throughout the whole of Antarctica.

He discusses in some detail the claims. The fact of the matter is that there are a number of conflicting claims, but, as the Senator has so thoroughly pointed out, all these claims are held in abeyance. But we do not neglect our right to our claim.

Mr. RUSSELL. No; we have never asserted our claim.

Mr. HUMPHREY. That is the fact.

Mr. RUSSELL. We are far behind Argentina, Chile, England, France, Australia, New Zealand, and Norway—countries that have asserted claims, whether they are conflicting or not.

Mr. HUMPHREY. But no other nation has recognized those claims.

Mr. RUSSELL. In this treaty we are stepping back for 30 more years.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I say most respectfully to the Senator from Georgia that we do not step back at all. We leave ourselves in the position of status quo. We still reserve our right to make any claims we wish to make. If we are going back to original claims, we must go back to the claims of the United Kingdom and Norway. Those countries were the first there.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator from Minnesota falls into the error of considering that every other nation has a better claim than has the United States. I do not agree with that statement at all.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I do not agree that every other nation has a better claim than we have. I believe our claim is substantial, and I believe the United States has done more in Antarctica than has any other nation. I think the Russians have cleverly worked their way into this particular area. I do not deny that. But I say that on the basis of original contact with the area, our major contact came in the 1920's with the Byrd expedition. Of course, some of our explorers visited the area prior to that.

Mr. RUSSELL. We sent Wilkes down there in 1838.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I agree.

Mr. RUSSELL. And before that other Americans had been down there.

Mr. HUMPHREY. As I recall, the New Zealanders made some claim in this area through British expeditions. The Scandinavians had some claim in this area, if they wished to exercise it. We have exercised no claim, and we have not recognized any claims, but we have not given up any right to exercise a claim. In other words, we are doing under this treaty nothing more than we have done up to date in terms of original claims, but we seek some agreement relating to international inspection and to scientific exploration.

We can inspect any station. We can fly over the area. We can forward our claim to the area. We have lost nothing, it seems to me, and we may have gained considerable.

Mr. RUSSELL. I wish I could be as optimistic as is the Senator from Minnesota. In my opinion, if we ratify this treaty, we shall have lost all and gained nothing.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. The Senator has well made the point, and it has been agreed to, that this Nation, through its State Department has been derelict in never asserting any American claims in the Antarctic. I think our potential claims are probably the best of all and the most numerous. We have no claim because none has been asserted.

The last sentence of article 4 reads:

Antarctica. No new claim, or enlargement of an existing claim to territorial sovereignty in Antarctica shall be asserted while the present treaty is in force.

Our claim has never been asserted, and in the treaty we agree not to assert any claims for another 30 years.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Phleger, the architect of the treaty, said he hoped that would be the situation in perpetuity.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Meanwhile, there are a number of Communist satellites, such as Red China, which is the largest; Bulgaria, Hungary, Rumania, and Czechoslovakia, to mention a few, which are not signatories to the treaty. They could go down there any day or night and not be bound by the treaty, and the provision with respect to right of inspection would not apply to those nations.

As the Senator knows, those nations are not signatories.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator from Louisiana has put his finger on a fundamental weakness of the treaty. It binds only 12 countries. There is reference in the treaty to getting some action in the United Nations if anything happens, but we have not always been successful in using the United Nations as an instrument to assert rights or claims unless the United States foots most of the bill in blood and money as was the case in Korea. But in this instance, a nation like Red China could move into the antarctic territory tomorrow and say, "We are building a military base," and we would have to say, "We have never asserted any claim to that land."

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. With reference to the point discussed between the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], I call attention to article X of the treaty. Article X is to me a rather significant article. It reads:

Each of the contracting parties undertakes—

That is a mutual undertaking—to exert appropriate efforts consistent with the Charter of the United Nations, to the end that no one—

It does not say "no one of the contracting parties," but it says "no one," which is an all-inclusive phrase—that no one engages in any activity in Antarctica contrary to the principles or purposes of the present treaty.

Had the makers of the treaty wished to say that the provision was to be limited only to the 12 contracting parties, I think they would have said so in the treaty. They might have said, "to the end that no one of the contracting parties engages in any activity in Antarctica." They did not say that. They said, "no one," which means no nation.

Mr. RUSSELL. I agree fully that article X is the expression of a pious hope that nations not signatory to the treaty will not come in. Those who drew the treaty were not referring to the 12 signatory nations. They were hoping that no other nation would come in. But what machinery have they to enforce it? How are they to get another nation out? That is my question. If Red China were to send a large expedition tomorrow to the lands that other nations have not claimed—for example, Marie Byrd land—does the Senator think the United Nations, under the language of the treaty and consistent with the Charter of the United Nations, would help those 12 countries get Red China out of there?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. How does the Senator believe we can do it without a treaty?

Mr. RUSSELL. I would settle the title to the area now.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. How would the Senator propose to get Red China out?

Mr. RUSSELL. I would settle the question under the declaration of that great Secretary of State Cordell Hull in 1940, when he applied the Monroe Doctrine to this vast area.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. How does the Senator propose that we could settle the title now without a treaty?

Mr. RUSSELL. I will get to that subject in a few minutes. I would keep them out just as I would keep them out of the United States itself. In 1940, when Germany was suspected of seeking this area, Cordell Hull undertook to apply the Monroe Doctrine all the way to the South Pole. I will leave the discussion there, and stand on that policy, instead of backing up, surrendering, and giving way every time someone writes a treaty and brings it before the Senate.

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. ENGLE. What right do 12 nations have to write a treaty, and in it say that they are going to kick others out of 20 percent of Antarctica on which none of them has made any claim and on which no other nation has made any claim? What conceivable right have these 12 nations to undertake to say that no one else on the face of the earth shall get on a piece of ground that none of them has claimed or anyone else has claimed?

Mr. RUSSELL. None, so far as I can see. Viewed in its best light, this treaty puts us in a dog-in-the-manger attitude. The treaty nations say, "We are not claiming any right, but you cannot assert any down there either."

It shows the fallacy of the entire proposition. I realize that the official position of the administration is in support of the treaty. There are certain limitations under which we work, and we must do the best we can in the light of the orders that have gone out from the higher echelons.

Adm. George J. Dufek has been a great leader in the U.S. explorations to Antarctica; I believe he accompanied Admiral Byrd on some of the earlier trips. Recently, Admiral Dufek voiced grave concern about the effect of the treaty on the status of our U.S. territorial claims. He believes that the United States should assert its territorial claims before the treaty is ratified, even though in fairness to Admiral Dufek it should be stated that he favors the objectives of the treaty. However, he feels that we should assert our territorial claims before ratifying the treaty. Otherwise he correctly assumes that our claims will be jeopardized, if not entirely lost.

The admiral, who commanded the Navy's Deepfreeze operations, outlined his feeling on this treaty in testimony only a few weeks ago before a subcommittee of the House, where he was appearing on another matter.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the portion of his testimony dealing with the matter of claims be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the excerpt from the testimony was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I think we should make up our minds now whether to make claims or not make claims and go ahead with this treaty. I recommended a few years ago that we claim the unclaimed sector of the Antarctic but at the same time form a condominium with New Zealand and France in which these four nations would share the condominium—a large sector of the Antarctic Continent. Nothing was done about that.

I still feel very strongly about it that that is what we should do.

If this treaty is ratified, it means that no new claims will be made. Of course, they will be frozen and no one gives up any claims over this period of 30 years. But we have no claims to hang on to.

Over the past hundred years we have sent expeditions to the Antarctic. Since 1928, when Admiral Byrd led his first expedition there * * * we have had bases in the Antarctic and we have put in a great deal of effort, cost of money and men and material to build these bases, and develop the information on the country.

Now, the Russians had never had a base on the Antarctic Continent, until the beginning of the IGY and they were invited to participate in the scientific investigation. Now, if we wait 30 years, if this treaty is ratified and nothing is said about claims for 30 years, and the Russians are there for 30 years along with us, then their claims to any part of the Antarctic are greatly strengthened and then we would be in a very difficult position if for some reason we wanted to go into claims again.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. HOLLAND. I was especially interested to note that the Senator from Georgia mentioned the action of our distinguished former Secretary of State, Cordell Hull, and in the Senator's reference to the Monroe Doctrine, which has now become an inter-American doctrine.

I have before me what is said to be one of the latest maps of the antarctic region. I notice that it is only approximately 1,000 miles or less from South America to the area of Antarctica which is closest to Latin America, immediately south of Argentina and Chile, the Palmer Peninsula.

Mr. RUSSELL. I believe it is only about 500 or 600 miles.

Mr. HOLLAND. I believe it is about 1,000 miles from the mainland. There are areas lying off the mainland which are closer.

I should like to ask the Senator whether it is not possible under this treaty for the Soviets to enter upon those closest areas to Latin America and to construct airbases, ostensibly for the purpose of exploration and scientific discovery, but which would be just as useful, in case of emergency or war, for military purposes.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator is eminently correct.

Later in my remarks I will discuss the military implications of the treaty. I will point out that the Russians could establish bases there that would have the effect of closing the passage between Palmer Peninsula and the tip of the continent of South America, which is vital to us in case of any international emergency.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. I note from the same map that these distances which intervene between those close-by land areas of Antarctica and those two important friends of ours, Argentina and Chile, and, for that matter, between Antarctica and the South American Continent, are much shorter than the distances from important cities in our country and Canada to our own air bases in Greenland, which we prize so highly.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator is correct.

Mr. HOLLAND. Do we not regard that complex of bases in Greenland, and in other areas of the far north, of vast importance to our own defense?

Mr. RUSSELL. Not only are they of vast importance to our own defense, but they are our principal sources of information to warn us of a surprise attack, information that might enable us to save countless Americans from devastation in a nuclear war.

Mr. HOLLAND. Does the Senator think it is a matter of great importance that under the proposed treaty our own potential and greatest rival and enemy would be able, without interference, to construct air bases on Palmer Peninsula and in other areas in Antarctica relatively close to the South American Continent?

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not believe there is any question about it.

Mr. HOLLAND. It is of great consequence, is it not?

Mr. RUSSELL. It would impose an unbearable threat, one we could not afford to tolerate, if we knew about it.

Mr. HOLLAND. I should like to ask the Senator one more question.

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. As chairman of the Committee on Armed Services undoubtedly the Senator has the best opportunity given to any Member of the Senate to know about the defense aspects of the matter. Is the Senator from Georgia concerned or unconcerned about the defense implications of this treaty?

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator from Florida has identified the primary concern of the Senator from Georgia. I will deal with that in my remarks, at some length in a few minutes, to show that this is a matter of vital concern to us from the standpoint of the defense of the United States. The world has been so diminished in size that if we fail to utilize all geographical advantages, and if we take a chance that will enable a potential enemy to utilize that area, it could contribute to a disaster for our country. I cannot make it any stronger than that. It could destroy us.

Mr. HOLLAND. I am inclined to apologize to the Senator for having gone into this phase at this stage.

Mr. RUSSELL. I am glad the Senator has done so.

Mr. HOLLAND. Will the Senator yield for one more question?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. I note from the map that the air distance between Antarctica and the South American Continent is decidedly shorter than the distance between the South American Continent and the areas in Africa which are closest to the South American Continent. Would the United States be unconcerned, from the defense standpoint, to have the Soviets move in and build airbases in the area of Africa which is closest to the South American Continent?

Mr. RUSSELL. The question answers itself, of course. It shows that this is a very important aspect. I shall point out later that not only is the Panama Canal susceptible of destruction, but some of our greatest striking forces at sea cannot use the canal because it is not large enough to accommodate new carriers. We must use this Antarctic area and must keep it open. I will discuss this aspect at some length later.

Mr. HOLLAND. I appreciate the Senator's intention to deal with this matter. Speaking for myself, I feel that we would be blind if we did not recognize that, while the treaty provides that no military use shall be made of Antarctica, it is entirely possible for the Soviets or any other potential enemy under cover of this treaty to create what could be used quickly and almost overnight as air bases very close to friends of ours and within striking distance of military bases of our country.

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not believe they would do it directly. I believe that, under cover of hypocrisy and sanctimony, they might utilize one of their satellites.

As a matter of fact, they have already turned over one of their Geophysical Year bases to Poland, and are threatening to turn over another one to Czechoslovakia. Neither of those countries is a signatory to the treaty. Neither of them would be morally bound not to build bases, as the Senator has said.

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. ENGLE. I should like to emphasize the testimony of Admiral Dufek, to which the Senator has referred, and which was put in the RECORD. I should like to make this very clear, because it has been stated that all the military people favor the treaty.

Admiral Dufek, who knows more about this subject than any other naval officer, said:

> If this treaty is ratified, it means that no new claims will be made. Of course, they will be frozen and no one gives up any claims over this period of 30 years. But we have no claims to hang on to.

He goes on to say, plainly, that he is not in favor of the treaty unless those claims are made. I am glad the Senator from Georgia has brought up that point, because Admiral Dufek does not support the ratification of the treaty in the absence of the firming up of those claims.

Mr. RUSSELL. We all realize that when the word comes out from the Secretary of Defense, that is the party line; those on active duty have to take that position. But Admiral Dufek is retired.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. DODD. I simply wish to raise one question and make a statement. Unfortunately, I was called to the telephone at the time the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] was posing questions to the distinguished Senator from Georgia about what the treaty does to our claims. I notice that the language of the treaty and the report of the committee both assure us that the treaty in no way prejudices the rights of the United States. However, I also find in the report of the committee a statement by Dr. Philip Jessup. I wonder whether the Senator from Georgia is familiar with it. Dr. Jessup is very friendly to the pending proposal, and was testifying before the committee on the matter of why it is to our advantage. Dr. Jessup said:

> It would prevent the development of previously asserted claims of other countries to parts of Antarctica.

My question is, How in the world can anyone logically argue that if the treaty prevents claims of other countries being asserted, it does not prevent ours? I think that point ought to be made clear.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator from Connecticut is absolutely correct. It does not pretend to be any limitation whatever on the claims of any country except the countries signatory to the treaty, as Admiral Dufek pointed out in his testimony.

There is such a thing as squatters' rights and squatters' sovereignty; and there is title by prescription.

This is what Admiral Dufek said:

> Now, the Russians had never had a base in the Antarctic Continent until the beginning of the International Geophysical Year, and they were invited to participate in the scientific investigation. Now, if we wait 30 years, if this treaty is ratified, and nothing is said about claims for 30 years, and the Russians are there for 30 years along with us, then their claims to any part of the Antarctic are greatly strengthened and then we would be in a very different position if for some reason we wanted to go into claims again.

That is elementary. If the Russians stay there for 30 years, and then we said we would go back to 1820, to our original claim that we had never asserted from that time until now, I do not think it would be persuasive.

Mr. President, it is sad to relate, but we have only ourselves to blame for the illogical, implausible position that we now face in Antarctica. As has been pointed out by Admiral Dufek, Admiral Byrd, and others, this is due to our having failed to assert—formally and officially—our unchallengable claims to a large section of that continent. That should have been done a long time ago. Almost everyone, including some of the supporters of the treaty, deplore our failure to make claims. But no one has yet given a satisfactory answer to the mystery of why we have not made those claims.

Admiral Byrd believed, as early as 1936, that we had established clear claim to a large section of the continent. He said:

> As to geography, we have discovered and taken possession for the United States of a land area as large as the combined Atlantic Seaboard States from Maine to Georgia. There can be no controversy concerning the ownership of this land for it is beyond the British claim and no human eye other than that of American citizens has ever looked down upon this land.

Mr. President, think of this vast area, larger than the area from Maine to Georgia, upon which no eyes other than American have ever looked upon; yet no formal claim has been made to it, and we are asked to vote to ratify the treaty, and to postpone into oblivion any hope of ever asserting any claims to it.

This subject has been before the Senate Committee on Armed Services from time to time. In 1954 we were told that one purpose of the then forthcoming expedition to Antarctica would be to establish our territorial claims there.

I have obtained permission from the members of the committee to read portions of the transcript of the executive hearing of the meeting of the Committee on Armed Services held on July 29, 1954. At that time, Mr. President, I asked Admiral Nunn, who was the spokesman for the Navy, and who appeared before the committee, if one of the purposes of the expedition would be to establish our claims in Antarctica. I read from the transcript:

> Senator RUSSELL. One of the purposes of this expedition, I assume, Admiral, would be to not only notify the world that we are claiming the area there, but to give evidence of the fact that we are insisting on our title that we have acquired by prior explorations; is that right?
> Admiral NUNN. That is part of it, sir; definitely.
> Senator RUSSELL. Thank you.

Later in the meeting, I said:

> It should be a matter of transcendent importance to have a valid claim.
> I hope the ground that they come upon, that they fly over it with an airplane, at least as to the far reaches, and perhaps drop a few little lead cylinders stating that this is U.S. territory, all over the entire area.

Mr. President, a resolution was adopted at that time by the committee, urging that plans for the expedition be carried out for the purpose of validating American claims. The resolution was adopted on July 29, 1954. It is quite brief; I shall therefore read it into the RECORD:

> Resolved, That the Committee on Armed Services of the Senate, recognizing the immediate need for further exploration on the Antarctic Continent, urges and commends that an expedition be undertaken at the earliest possible date, under the direction of the President, for the purpose of validating the territorial claims of the United States and thereby increasing the security of this Nation, exploring the mineral resources of the area, and accomplishing any possible advancements with respect to mapping surveys and scientific observations.

Mr. President, a copy of that resolution was sent to the present President of the United States and was acknowledged by him personally. The resolution was not adopted as an effort on the part of Democrats to embarrass the new Republican administration. At that time the Republicans were in control of Congress, and the Committee on Armed Services was presided over by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL]. The resolution simply expressed the feelings of the members of the committee—Republicans and Democrats—that the United States was already late in asserting its territorial claims, and that it should take steps to do so.

For a time, it appeared that something might be done along that line. It is worthy of note that earlier postwar Antarctic expeditions were officially and specifically directed to enhance and promote U.S. territorial claims to the southern polar region. For example, the directive for Operation Highjump in 1946—and I can read this because the paper has since been declassified—set forth one of its missions as consolidating and extending U.S. sovereignty over the largest practicable area of the Antarctic Continent.

Similar instructions were given Operation Windmill in 1947 and Operation Deepfreeze I in 1955. Subsequent deepfreeze operations, however, were assigned no political or territorial mission because of the nonpolitical nature of the International Geophysical Year.

Mr. President, I have searched diligently for any possible reason, however farfetched, as to why the United States has failed to validate its claims to this area.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MUSKIE in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. THURMOND. If the purpose of the United States expeditions was not to stake out claims for purposes of defense and the obtaining of minerals and other purposes, what was the purpose of those expeditions?

Mr. RUSSELL. When the Armed Services Committee approved those expeditions, those of us who serve on the committee had in mind the assertion of territorial sovereignty over those vast areas of the Antarctic Continent.

Mr. THURMOND. That was the reason why the American expeditions were made, was it not?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes, so far as I am concerned; and I think the same is true of the other members of the Armed Services Committee.

Mr. THURMOND. The able Senator from Georgia has been chairman of the Armed Services Committee for many years, except during the brief period when the Republicans had a majority; and no Member of the Senate is more familiar than is he with this subject. I desire to commend him for the magnificent argument he is presenting, in bringing to the attention of the American people the importance of not ratifying this treaty.

Mr. RUSSELL. I thank the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. THURMOND. Is there any reason for bringing Russia into this matter? Russia has not justified any claim there. If Russia were now brought in, she would only be in a position to veto whatever the United States wishes to do.

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes; I have already referred to that.

Mr. THURMOND. Is it not a fact that Russia would not regard any such contract seriously? In fact, has not Russia repudiated 50 out of the 52 contracts into which she has entered? If Russia enters into this one, it will be nothing more than a scrap of paper, to be repudiated at the whim of Russia, will it not?

Mr. RUSSELL. Certainly. The record of history shows that the Soviets will immediately violate any agreement, however solemn, that they may have signed, whenever it may suit their purposes to violate it. They adhere to treaties only so long as the agreements suit Russia's ambitions and aims.

Mr. THURMOND. I am glad the Senator from Georgia has made the point that the opposition to ratification of the treaty is not an attempt to embarrass the administration. It is merely an effort to protect the interests of the United States.

In any event I will oppose the treaty, no matter who negotiated it or advocated it, because it is not in the best interests of the United States.

Mr. RUSSELL. I share the Senator's views; and I, too, will oppose this treaty, regardless of who advocated it.

Mr. President, I probably shall not be able to cover, in the time available to me, all the points I wish to cover.

One of these is the so-called Hughes doctrine. Mr. Phleger, the architect of the treaty, relied on it; and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] and others have referred to the Hughes doctrine. This doctrine was to the effect that we adhered to a position of not asserting any claim unless we occupied an area, and that the physical characteristics of Antarctica were such that we had no valid basis for making territorial claims in Antarctica. I think it only fair to say that that was the position of the United States, as announced by Secretary Hughes in 1924. But, Mr. President, times change; and as they have changed, our policies have changed.

As a matter of fact, as long ago as 1933, in a case before the Court of International Justice in connection with a dispute between Denmark and Norway over Greenland, the so-called Hughes policy was stricken down and annulled. In addition, our most extensive explorations in Antarctica have been made since the announcement of the Hughes doctrine.

I think it also fair to point out that our views have changed very considerably, particularly in the period leading up to World War II.

Indeed, a 1939 report by the State Department, drawn up at the request of President Roosevelt, actually reversed the Hughes doctrine. The report strongly supported U.S. interests in the Antarctic, citing the impending importance of transpolar aviation, the strategic location of Antarctica from a military standpoint, the probability of rich mineral resources, and the concern about claims by other nations.

Immediately following the report, the U.S. Antarctic Service was created in the Department of Interior to lay the groundwork for asserting this country's claims.

Out of that grew the various explorations by Admiral Byrd. Admiral Byrd was placed in charge of the Service's expedition to the Antarctic, which headed south in 1939.

Admiral Byrd's instructions from President Roosevelt, set forth in a letter dated November 25, 1939, 15 years after the Hughes pronouncement, and completely contrary to it—made clear the new U.S. position with respect to territorial claims in the Antarctic.

The President's letter said:

> Members of the service may take appropriate steps such as dropping written claims from airplanes, depositing such writing in cairns, et cetera, which might assist in supporting a sovereignty claim by the U.S. Government. Careful records shall be kept of the circumstances surrounding such act. No public announcement of such act shall, however, be made without specific authority in each case from the Secretary of State.

Secretary of State Hull gave further evidence, as I have said, of the new U.S. position in May 1940, when, in effect, he extended the Monroe Doctrine to the South Pole. With an eye on the growing Nazi menace in Europe, Hull stated:

> Considerations of continental defense make it vitally important to keep for the 21 American Republics a clearer title to that part of the Antarctic Continent south of America that is claimed by any non-American country.

Mr. President, if this treaty is ratified, the Senate will renounce the extension of the Monroe Doctrine to the South Pole, as announced by Secretary Hull, and will put all that area into the hands of 11 other nations, including Soviet Russia that have no legitimate claim there.

The American people are entitled to have a fuller debate in regard to this matter than we have had on this issue.

At this time, Mr. President, I wish to inquire how much time remains available to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time available to the Senator from Georgia will expire at 1:48.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, for the time being I should like to reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, at this point will my colleague yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. TALMADGE. I desire to express to my distinguished colleague my appreciation of the able and scholarly address he has made on this subject. In my opinion it is unanswerable. I know that in his long and distinguished service as chairman of the Armed Services Committee of the Senate, he has devoted many years to the study of this subject. I believe that any Member of the Senate who hears or who reads the remarks the Senator from Georgia has made today must refuse to vote to abrogate America's claim to this territory. Certainly I take that position.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I thank my colleague.

Let me ask the distinguished chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee whether he will be willing to suggest the absence of a quorum at this time, or whether some other Senator is prepared to speak at this time.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. CARLSON] said he wished to speak for a few minutes.

Mr. RUSSELL. Very well.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Let me ask how much time the Senator from Kansas desires to have.

Mr. CARLSON. Ten minutes.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Very well; I yield 10 minutes to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, first, I wish to express my appreciation to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], who, in my opinion, has rendered a service to the Senate in discussing this treaty as he sees it. However, I do not agree with his views on this particular treaty. It was my good fortune to be a member, not only of the Foreign Relations Committee, but——

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I had intended to ask the Senator if he cared to have a quorum call, with the understanding that the time would not come out of that of either side.

Mr. CARLSON. I would not object, but I assure the Senator it is not necessary.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I would like to have the Senate have the opportunity to know the Senator from Kansas is speaking.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum, with the understanding that the time will not be charged to either side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BIBLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, preceding the call for the quorum, I had expressed my appreciation to the distinguished Senator from Georgia for the service he had rendered in discussing this treaty. I stated I appreciated his views, but did not agree with his conclusions on the treaty. I think it is well that all treaties be discussed and analyzed. Of all those with whom I dislike to be in disagreement, I dislike most to be in disagreement with the distinguished Senator from Georgia, who is not only an able legislator, but who has had many years of service here, which demands that we give thought to his suggestions on this treaty.

I rise in support of the Antarctic Treaty and sincerely hope it will be approved by the Senate. There have been many treaties before the Senate for approval, but I firmly believe that this is one of the most constructive documents presented during my years of service in the Senate.

First, we were fortunate to have as negotiators on this treaty men who have had years of experience in this field. I know of no one that I think is more qualified and who has the qualifications than the Honorable Herman Phleger, who was our representative and head of the U.S. delegation to the conference on Antarctica. In addition, we had Ambassador Paul Daniels, who was the alternate representative, and Mr. George H. Owen. These individuals, with the background they have give me a great deal of confidence in the matter that is before the Senate.

As I started to mention earlier, it was my privilege, as a Member of the Senate, to be listed as one of the congressional advisers, together with the distinguished Senator from Wyoming [Mr. McGEE]. Those of us who were given that privilege were briefed daily during the discussions.

It has been said that this treaty was hastily entered into. The facts are, according to the testimony before the committee, that conferences regarding the treaty began on May 2, 1958. It is true that actual negotiations did not begin until months later, but there were conferences between the 12 nations, and they reached an agreement on the details, so when they did meet they were in a position to write this treaty.

I wish to point out that this treaty was conceived by the United States. I think when the Senate acts on the treaty today it should keep in mind that this country originated the idea. We called the nations together. That is the first reason why the treaty should be ratified.

Second, the conference which drafted it, comprising the individuals representing the 12 countries, was called at the instance of the United States. We conceived the idea. We called these nations together.

Third, the treaty contained all of the provisions which the United States believed were required for the protection of our national interest.

With that background, and with the men who negotiated this treaty representing the United States, I cannot be as concerned as are some individual Members of the Senate as to the contents of the treaty.

There were several reasons why we tried to reach an agreement, and did reach an agreement, on the treaty. The main objectives of our Government in negotiating this treaty were, first, to prevent the use of Antarctica for military purposes, and to assure that this continent should remain an area where only peaceful activities were pursued.

During the testimony before our committee, Mr. Phleger discussed this matter, which will be found on page 44 of the hearings. In regard to the objective of preventing the use of Antarctica for military purposes, he said this:

> As regards this objective, article I stipulates that Antarctica shall be used for peaceful purposes only and that all measures of a military nature there are forbidden. Of course, we know that agreements prohibiting military activity in a certain area must necessarily be complemented by some system of effective control in order to assure their observance. In this treaty, the provisions of article VII which I have outlined establish sweeping, immediate, and unilateral rights of inspection pursuant to which U.S. observers may go anywhere throughout Antarctica at any time. In addition, there are established absolute, unrestricted rights of overflight for aerial observation.

We have been trying for months and months—probably for years—to negotiate inspection on an international basis, at Geneva. Now we have an opportunity, in the Senate today, to vote to have an area where we have established these rights subject to inspection under a treaty which has been signed by 12 nations, including the Soviet Union.

There was a second objective. The second objective was to continue the valuable scientific investigation throughout Antarctica which our scientists have been engaged in for the past several years, and to promote the continuation of international cooperation for the purpose of continued scientific investigation. Even during the discussion of the distinguished Senator from Georgia this morning, the Senator mentioned and realized the importance of the scientific investigation in this great area, an area larger than the United States and Europe combined.

Mr. Phleger, when he discussed this particular objective before our committee, made a pertinent comment. I shall read the objective, as Mr. Phleger stated it:

> Second objective was to continue the valuable investigation throughout Antarctica which our scientists have been engaged in for the past several years, and to promote the continuation of international cooperation—

We have been striving for that—

> For the purpose of such scientific investigation among the parties to the treaty, in the same manner that was instituted during the International Geophysical Year.

These are Mr. Phleger's words, and he wrote the treaty:

> In this regard, article II of the treaty provides that scientific investigation and cooperation to that end, as practiced during the International Geophysical Year, will continue, subject, of course, to the provisions of the treaty.

That is an important step. I think we are all agreed it is important in this great area.

Mr. President, the third objective was to eliminate controversies arising out of territorial claims. We have heard a lot of discussion this morning about territorial claims. Many countries have claims. None of them, including the United States, has pressed the claims.

The third objective, in addition, was to eliminate, insofar as possible, any political rivalry which accompanied the claims. It is only natural that if we began to press our claims there would be political rivalries involved.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CARLSON. I am happy to yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I thank the Senator.

I intend to vote for ratification, but one of the things which has been bothering me in connection with the treaty is found in a comment at the bottom of page 3 of the committee report. The last paragraph on that page states:

> Disputes between two or more contracting parties, according to article XI, should be resolved through consultation and means of their own choice. If not so resolved, any dispute may be referred to the International Court of Justice, but only with the consent of all parties to the dispute. In this connection, while the United States and the majority of the contracting parties were willing to accept compulsory jurisdiction by the International Court, the opposition of three signatories negated that proposal.

The Senator has brought up the question of claims, and so on. My question is, How are those claims to be settled if the parties cannot agree and will not go to the International Court of Justice?

Mr. CARLSON. It so happened that at the time of consideration of the treaty by the 12 countries, some of the countries had already filed their claims. The United States has not made any claim, but two or three countries have formal claims. Those countries are the ones which negated this section, as to how this should be handled. Those countries felt they had priority rights.

I would say that is a matter which will have to be determined by a meeting of the countries affected in the future.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. In other words, a controversy which exists as between two countries may continue? There is no way of ending that controversy under the form of the treaty?

Mr. CARLSON. It could continue. It is now continuing and it no doubt will continue.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I have one other question in that connection. I refer to page 4 of the report, the second paragraph, which states:

> Amendment and duration of the treaty are covered by article XII. The treaty may be modified or amended at any time, but only by unanimous agreement of the consultative parties.

In substance that means there will be no amendment to the treaty for 30 years; is that correct?

Mr. CARLSON. It was brought out by the committee that while the treaty has no specified duration——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. CARLSON. Will the Senator yield me an additional 3 minutes?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield 3 more minutes to the Senator from Kansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas is recognized for 3 more minutes.

Mr. CARLSON. I state to the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts that in the report it is also stated:

> While the treaty has no specified duration, it is provided that after 30 years any of the consultative parties may request a conference of all treaty members to review the operation of the treaty. Amendments approved at such a conference by a majority of those represented, including a majority of the consultative parties, will enter into force when ratified by all of the latter parties.
>
> Any country—

Including the United States—> may withdraw from the treaty, effective 2 years after notification, if an amendment approved at such a conference does not enter into force within 2 years.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. As a practical matter, it means that when we make the treaty it will last for 30 years.

Mr. CARLSON. That is correct, provided these folks keep the commitments they have entered into in the treaty.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. And there is no method to completely resolve the dispute between two contracting parties?

Mr. CARLSON. Except that individual countries can withdraw, under certain circumstances, within the 2-year period.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Can a country withdraw before the 30 years have expired?

Mr. CARLSON. Only those nations which adhere after the agreement comes into effect.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CARLSON. I am happy to yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. One Member of the Senate is necessarily absent today, the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CASE]. The Senator telephoned me a little while ago and told me that he was on an urgent mission with respect to certain appropriation matters with regard to our public lands and the interior domain, but he does have an abiding interest in the pending matter. As a member of the Committee on Armed Services, I believe the Senator from South Dakota first introduced the resolution to authorize an expedition to Antarctica; and he subsequently, I think, was one of the moving forces in making possible the cooperation of the Navy, as well as the transfer of funds to the proper account so that the Navy might manifest an interest in this matter.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. As a member of the Committee on Armed Services I would say that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CASE] did initiate a bill and did work out a compromise arrangement so that the Navy could go to Antarctica.

Mr. DIRKSEN. In his statement over the telephone today the Senator from South Dakota made the point that he regards this as a real opportunity to test our relations with other countries and with the Soviet Union in a field which is far from here, where rights are somewhat indefinite and in conflict. He could think of no better place for the matter to be fully tested and explored.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Kansas has expired.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I yield 2 more minutes to the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas is recognized for 2 more minutes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I think that is an important point.

Another point made by the Senator from South Dakota was that if there were Members of the Senate who felt we had to go in for partition, then the question arises, How would we partition the area? If we tried to divide it up like a pie, we would only develop more conflicts of interest there and solve no problems at all.

Out of his experience, out of his background, and out of his continuing interest in this problem, the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CASE] would, if he could be present today, support ratification of the treaty.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, in conclusion I simply wish to state that the United States took the initiative in writing and securing the approval of the treaty by other countries affected. In so doing, our Nation again demonstrated its interest in trying to work out cooperative arrangements with other nations in order to build a program for peace and security.

I think Mr. Phleger expressed it well when he stated:

> This treaty, for the first time in history, devotes a large area of the world to peaceful purposes with adequate inspection. It is the first treaty which prohibits nuclear explosions, with adequate inspection.
> It is the first treaty to provide freedom of scientific investigation over large areas, and it constitutes a precedent in the field of disarmament, prohibition of nuclear explosions and the law of space.

It is for these reasons I am supporting the treaty and sincerely hope that Members of the Senate will do likewise.

I ask unanimous consent that an article written by Arthur Krock which appeared in the New York Times be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

VITAL ANTARCTIC TREATY

(By Arthur Krock)

WASHINGTON.—Just before the Senate recessed for the national conventions, Majority Leader JOHNSON promised Chairman FULBRIGHT of the Committee on Foreign Relations that one of the first actions after the Senate reassembles on August 8 will be consideration of the Antarctic Treaty. The committee favorably reported this legislation on June 21.

Senator JOHNSON also promised opponents of the treaty sufficient time for full discussion of their objections. The vehemence of this opposition is surprising because of the great advantages of the treaty to the United States and the weight its rejection would give to a charge by the Soviet Union that the basic disarmament policy of this Nation is a sham. That policy is expressed by the standing offer of the United States to reduce armaments and ban nuclear explosions on a global scale if the compact is safeguarded by adequate inspection and control, a formula the Soviet Union accepted in signing the Antarctic Treaty.

The treaty also reserves all U.S. territorial claims in Antarctica, and prohibits any signatory nation from making claims founded on its activities during the life of the treaty. It has been our historic position that sovereignty over unpeopled areas is acquired by discovery and exploration only when accompanied by an effective occupation. The latter is unattainable in a frozen terrain as large as the United States plus Europe.

By the requirement of effective occupation, the treaty sets a precedent against Soviet claims of celestial sovereignty if its aeronauts should be the first to reach the moon or the planets. This is a vital defense policy in the space age.

The treaty bans all military action, including nuclear explosions, and grants unlimited and unilateral right of inspection and overflight to every signatory nation.

The full Senate debate pledged by Senator JOHNSON will disclose the nature of the opposition to this great diplomatic achievement by the United States. It was negotiated in a period when Soviet-American relations made it possible to gain Moscow's agreement to a compact which will demilitarize an entire continent and forbid nuclear explosions in an area where the winds would steadily blow fallout northward over the entire southern hemisphere.

The present state of these relations is such that, if the Senate rejects the treaty, the progress it represents toward world peace will be canceled for the indefinite future.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Out of whose time does the Senator wish the time consumed for the quorum call to be taken?

Mr. MANSFIELD. Out of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, I ask that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I yield 10 minutes to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER].

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, I shall not take a great deal of time this afternoon to discuss the details and ramifications of this treaty, because it has already been discussed in great detail by able members of the Foreign Relations Committee. For me to rehash those details would be unnecessary and repetitious.

I do wish to say that the question of this Antarctic Treaty is something that has not been approached lightly. It has not been approached lightly by those in the State Department and the administration who have negotiated this treaty, and it has not been approached lightly by the Foreign Relations Committee, which has considered it. A great deal of thought and attention has been devoted to the whole situation involving the Antarctic area, and rightly so.

The Antarctic is unique, of course, in the territorial landmasses of the world. It is unique because it is in the main a great landmass, inaccessible, and practically unusable for commercial purposes because of its icecap. Therefore it is unique because the economic attractions which normally bring nations and people to territories of that kind are not in existence. It has been a geologic phenomenon in many ways, and it has attracted scientists and tempted the venturesome on voyages of discovery of one kind or another. But it has remained in recent times literally an unclaimed area of the world, and an area of the world whose utility, until very recent times, has been questionable for any practical purpose except scientific.

However, within the past few years, with the advance of science and the technology of military weapons and devices, the knowledge that outer space can be used for military purposes, and with the increase in the range and speed of rockets and other weapons of war, the question of the Antarctic as a potential military base has begun to draw the interest of some countries of the world.

The United States has perhaps done more exploratory work in the Antarctic than all the other countries of the world combined—at least so far as total expenditures and consistency of exploratory work are concerned. Much of that work was done under the late great Admiral Byrd, and we have a tradition and a history of scientific interest in that area.

Be that as it may, the United States has probably the most sustainable claims for sovereignty in the Antarctic of any nation in the world, but it has not seen fit to adopt a claim of sovereignty as a part of its national policy.

However, four or five countries have asserted sovereignty or claims to sovereignty over certain portions of the Antarctic. Those claims have not been recognized or agreed to by any other countries except the countries so asserting them, but that makes little difference. The claims have been asserted.

In recent years certain other countries have asserted and claimed and maintained certain interests and certain rights in the Antarctic. The interest in the Antarctic and the apparent intention of many countries to go into the Antarctic and establish further and broader interests certainly has become apparent. For that reason, and for many other reasons, it was considered highly desirable that we seek some kind of solution to the Antarctic problem before it became so confused and complex as to defy any kind of reasonable or satisfactory settlement. So this treaty was negotiated.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption at this point?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. What disturbs me most about the treaty is what prompted me to raise the question with the senior Senator from Kansas, namely, that there is no method in the treaty for finally resolving a difference of opinion or a dispute between two of the parties, without their consent. Is that correct?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. That is correct. A veto is provided on disputes, because decisions on any change of policy or alteration must be by unanimous consent.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. If that is true, and if a nation cannot get its difference of opinion resolved, can it resign from the agreement at the end of 2 years?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. There is that right in the case of a later contracting party rejecting an amendment agreed to by the 12 original parties.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Even before the 30 years have elapsed?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Yes; there is such a provision in the treaty. However, the original 12 contracting parties would not be so covered.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. According to page 4 of the committee report it would seem that a party could not resign until after 30 years.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I believe that under the circumstances described above a certain party to the treaty can, if it desires, set machinery in motion so that it can withdraw from the treaty, and would not have to wait for 30 years.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. That would be the only solution if, for instance, we put in a very strong claim and there was a contrary claim. Is that correct?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. That would be a violation rather than a solution. I will discuss the point in a moment, if I may. It was realized that some kind of solution to this problem was desirable now, before the Antarctic situation got so complicated that solutions could not be satisfactorily arrived at.

So all the nations of the world which have expressed any interest in Antarctica were invited to participate in the conferences, looking toward some contractual relationship or treaty or agreement which would approach a solution of these problems. Twelve nations only expressed an interest in Antarctica, and those nations got together and formulated the treaty.

The treaty is not perfect. I presume that if each Member of the Senate were trying to draw up a treaty there would be 100 different versions of it. I do not believe that in a vital matter of this kind every provision can be made satisfactory to everyone, particularly when there are four or five nations which have already asserted sovereignty. We have not asserted sovereignty. Whether we should have is beside the point now. However, a number of nations have asserted interests and rights of various kinds. When they get together there must be a compromise of what they believe to be their basic interests, if they are to arrive at a composite agreement which will move forward the cause of peace and the cause of proper administration of this great area.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MUSKIE in the chair). The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I yield 3 additional minutes to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. The treaty does not take away from the United States any existing rights which the United States has today, with the exception of the fact that the treaty—for its duration—does debar us and any other country from asserting in the future any additional claims to sovereignty. We give that up. So does every other country. So will every other nation which accedes to the treaty. So will every other member of the United Nations which accedes to the treaty in the future. No nation can assert any additional claims of sovereignty over and above those which they have asserted or claimed up to this time. So we are giving up nothing which we presently possess. We are giving to no nation anything that that nation does not already possess in the Antarctic. However, we are preventing by this treaty the possibility of a chaotic condition existing in Antarctica in the next few years, which could rise up to intrigue us, and cause us some trouble in that part of the world, which we never thought possible a short time ago. To me, that is the alternative we must face.

If we do not ratify this treaty, what is the alternative? The alternative is the possibility, and the strong probability, that there will be an increasing number of nations who will stake out claims in Antarctica, and we will have a mare's nest of international confusion that we will never be able to straighten out.

I believe this is a magnificent opportunity, first, to settle the jurisdictional questions in Antarctica and the question of rights in Antarctica, and, second, to prevent a mad scramble which an uninhibited world could get into. By the treaty we would prevent that from happening, and once and for all—I am speaking of the first 30 years of the treaty—establish the basic principle that Antarctic land shall be used under no circumstances for military purposes or for bases of any nation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has again expired.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, may I have an additional 2 minutes?

Mr. LAUSCHE. I yield 2 more minutes to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. That is vitally important. It is the first time, as far as I know, that we have had this opportunity.

There is another aspect which has been emphasized by other speakers, and that is that the treaty is clear that no signatory to the treaty—that is, anyone of the 12 nations—or any other nation which accedes to the treaty in the future, can import for military purposes any equipment or any personnel into Antarctica, and that every piece of equipment, every program, every plan that any nation has in Antarctica must be put down on the record beforehand. The ships and planes and vehicles that take that material into Antarctica are subject to inspection by every other party to the treaty, in advance. Installations in Antarctica are subject, not to an inspection of a committee of these nations, but by everyone of the 12 nations. Everyone of those nations has a right to inspect the installations and equipment and records of everyone of the other 11 nations, at any time, without any inhibition or restraint.

That to me is a tremendous step in international comity. It is a tremendous step on this great road that we are trying to follow to get access to the other man's operations. It is the same access that we are willing to give him so far as our operations are concerned.

Of course, the treaty is not perfect. I am the first to admit that it is not a perfect treaty. I would like to see certain things added to the treaty for our own benefit. However, we must bear in mind that some of the things which would copper-rivet the treaty so far as we are concerned would be totally unacceptable to other nations. I believe this is a great milestone and opportunity in the interest of the world and in the interest of the establishment of principles which we espouse.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield 5 minutes to me?

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, as I have listened to the debate today and read the speeches in the RECORD yesterday, the thought has gone through my mind that actually this is a contest in the Senate between the age which has passed and the age which is thronging before. A number of extremely able speeches have been made in opposition to the treaty, notably by the distinguished junior Senator from California [Mr. ENGLE] and the distinguished senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUS-SELL]. I honor their views, and regret that I cannot find it possible to be in accord with them.

The opposition to the treaty, in my judgment, is based on the old-fashioned theory of complete and absolute sovereignty; the right of any nation to do as it sees fit in a world which has become too small to permit that kind of conduct any longer to be feasible.

The distinguished Senator from Arkansas, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, has summarized, far more cogently than I could, the reasons supporting the ratification of the treaty. I shall not reiterate what has been so well stated. I should like to complete my brief remarks by reading a few comments from an editorial which was published not too long ago in a document rarely quoted on the floor of the Senate. I think we would be wise if we quoted from it more frequently. The editorial was published in the Saturday Review of Literature. Its distinguished editor, Norman Cousins, was speaking about an entirely different subject, but I think his remarks are pertinent to the subject under discussion today. He said:

The central problem, essentially, is to arrange the affairs of human society on earth in such a way as to make it safe for people. * * *

The fact is that life on earth is made possible by the most precarious balancing act in the universe.

Human life is the rarest, most complex, and most precious of all the prizes in the universe. It is this prize that is now in the process of being diminished and rejected—by humans themselves. * * *

The direction of men's thoughts * * * has yet to adjust itself to the new total demands. Forms of human organization, shaped in response to the evolving needs of the past, are absurdly inadequate for present and future. * * *

One problem that the individual nations most certainly cannot handle adequately has to do with the common safety of the world's peoples. * * *

Beyond the charges and countercharges and clamor of sovereignties a basic problem persists. The existing mechanisms by which human society operates are inadequate to sustain the cause of life. New mechanisms must be created. The time for creating them is short. * * * The place to begin is with the idea that it is necessary.

Mr. President, this treaty is an effort to create such a new mechanism. It will take out of the field of international rivalry a huge continent as yet not conquered by man. It is an experiment with an effort to make world peace possible through the rule of law. For that reason, I support the treaty.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the editorial from which I read, entitled, "Life and the Vital Fraction," be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LIFE AND THE VITAL FRACTION

It is said that the world has been totally changed since Paris. This may be true of the atmosphere. It may be true of the prospects. But it is not true of the problem. The nature of the problem remains the same.

The central problem, essentially, is to arrange the affairs of human society on earth in such a way as to make it safe for people. Things are now happening that threaten, within a comparatively short time, to reduce or eliminate that safety.

The failure of the Paris meeting has not changed the fact that life on earth is made possible by the most precarious balancing act in the universe. A small change in the total amount of radiation on earth could result in a vast reshuffling of species through wholesale mutations. A small shift in the distance of the earth to the sun could cause the earth either to freeze over or burn up.

The internal economy of the human being operates through an endless number of delicate balances. A small alteration in the balance inside the body of salt to water, of oxygen to carbon dioxide, of red blood cells to white, could put an end to life. Lessening of the supply of oxygen to the head for only a few consecutive minutes could damage the brain beyond repair.

* * * * *

That is, out of 500 million sperm cells available for fertilization, only 1 achieved fusion. No two cells were alike. Each had the potential stamp of a complete and unique personality built into it. It would be theoretically possible for a single man to double the earth's population, in terms of the sperm cells he could make available in a relatively short period of time.

In addition to the vital and elusive fractions, man must run a gamut represented by the hundreds of thousands of years it took life on earth to produce a species with intelligence, sensitivity, an awareness of beauty, a sense of wonder, and an ability to change its environment.

Human life is the rarest, most complex, and most precious of all the prizes in the universe. It is this prize that is now in the process of being diminished and rejected—by humans themselves. The humans are tampering with the vital fractions. They are altering the radiation balance in the atmosphere. They are damaging their own germ cells, producing defective creatures, and canceling out hundreds of thousands of years of evolving development. They are rearranging the vital proportions in the soil. Indeed, they are at the point of eliminating life altogether.

These new capacities have come up so suddenly that their thunderheads have hardly been observed. The direction of men's thoughts, conditioned by centuries of local environmental habits, has yet to adjust itself to the new total demands. Forms of human organization, shaped in response to the evolving needs of the past, are absurdly inadequate for present and future. Old methods for protecting life now become the fuse points for exploding it; that is, the Nation is no longer the outer ring of security. It is now a flailing unit of a world anarchy. The greater its insistence on maintaining its traditional absolute sovereignty, the greater the threat to its own people—and indeed, to all peoples.

It becomes necessary, then, for man to develop a survival perspective. He must think in a way he has never thought before—about his uniqueness, about his place in the universe, about the meaning and preciousness of life, about his values, about his relationship to other human beings, about the new institutions or mechanisms that are required to deal with random and pulverizing power, and about the rights of the next generation.

If there is any single vantage point in the world for the development and use of a survival perspective it should be the United Nations. No one knows whether another meeting of the leading statesmen will be held any time soon. But meetings of the United Nations are going on every day. The organization was created for the express purpose of coping with problems that the individual nations could not handle adequately. One problem that the individual nations most certainly cannot handle adequately has to do with the common safety of the world's peoples.

As soon as the United Nations gets over its present decibel-duel over spies and counterspies, high-flying planes and low-flying microphones, it would be helpful if it addressed itself to the main need. For beyond the charges and countercharges and clamor of sovereignties a basic problem persists. The existing mechanisms by which human society operates are inadequate to sustain the cause of life. New mechanisms must be created. The time for creating them is short. The U.N. might supply such a mechanism. The place to begin is with the idea that it is necessary.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whose time will the time for the quorum call be charged?

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time for the quorum call be charged to neither side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, do I correctly understand that the opponents of the treaty have some 38 minutes remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia is correct.

Mr. RUSSELL. I wish to address myself further to the treaty, but I do not desire to use all my time now if any Senator desires to speak on the other side of the question. If no other Senator desires to speak now, I shall proceed in my own time, but I give notice that if any Senator desires a brief opportunity to speak, I shall be happy to yield to him.

Mr. President, earlier in the day I discussed briefly the fantasy of bringing Russia into the Antarctic to share equally in this vast continent that lies around the South Pole. I also adverted to the lack of specific knowledge as to the actual wealth of that area. Despite the contentions that there was no evidence of mineral wealth, the evidence shows that less than 1 percent of the area of the Antarctic has been actually examined to determine the nature and extent of the mineral deposits there.

Time will not permit me to lay before the Senate all the objections I see to the treaty, but there are one or two aspects that I should like to discuss. One in particular is the effect this treaty has on the national security—the surrender of strategic advantage by the United States; the meaning of the threat to the defense of this country that is implied by the treaty.

It is an affront to the national pride and the national prestige that we have failed to assert our claims. Our failure poses a grave and direct threat to our national defense. It does not require any military genius to grasp the strategic importance of Antarctica in an age of intercontinental missiles, space rockets, and earth satellites.

Indeed, we were aware of this in the age of the ordinary submarine and of the airplane of 20 years ago. Secretary of State Cordell Hull looked far into the future when he proclaimed the doctrine that the American Republics would not permit any foreign power to take over this area. I regret very much that it is proposed here today to abandon that position and to retreat from the application of the Monroe Doctrine to the Palmer Peninsula which is vital to keeping open the Drake Passage.

The strategic importance of the Antarctic has been stated many times, in many different ways. But it has seldom been stated more eloquently or expertly than by the late Admiral Byrd, whom I consider our foremost Antarctic authority.

In a magazine article published in 1954, Byrd stated:

> As any astute military planner now knows, the nation that controls Palmer Peninsula at the northern tip of the continent could strangle America's lifeline in case of another world war.
>
> Should the easily disabled Panama Canal be knocked out by an A-bomb, ships traveling from the Atlantic to the Pacific would have to sail around the toe of South America, between Cape Horn and Antarctica. At present we have no defenses in that area and our ships would become easy prey for enemy jets and submarines that might some day be based on Antarctica.
> In fact, with work and foresight, Antarctica could some day be made into a large strategic American bomber base and A-bomb arsenal guarding the entire southern world. Bombers based there could effectively nullify any Soviet threat to South America, Australia, New Zealand, the southern Pacific islands, and parts of Africa.

Even the advocates of the treaty recognize and admit the military significance of this area. Mr. Phleger, the chief negotiator of the treaty, stated, when he appeared before the Foreign Relations Committee:

> Having in mind that the Palmer Peninsula is 400 miles from the tip of South America—

And, Mr. President, in terms of today's weapons, 400 miles is not as far as 50 miles was prior to World War II—> and that Antarctica is about 2,000 miles from Melbourne, Australia, and realizing the significance of that great area being opened for military purposes, the establishment of launching pads and missile bases, then you can well understand the agitation of the countries, our friends in the Southern Hemisphere, when the Soviet Union moved into that area.

A more persuasive argument could hardly be made for retaining full American interest in the Antarctic Continent, including the right to use it for defensive purposes if necessary. Mr. Phleger truly stated the threat. But as a remedy, he proposed that we permit the Russians to establish themselves in an area where they have no right to be in the first place.

Earlier, the distinguished Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] asked questions about the distance from the tip of the Palmer Peninsula to Africa. But, Mr. President, no American with even a meager knowledge of geography could today fail to grasp the strategic importance of that part of the Antarctic Continent.

Yet, the State Department contends the strategic importance of Antarctica is a primary reason that the United States should take the lead in neutralizing the continent, and why we should give Russia an equal voice in its control. Mr. President, I simply cannot understand any such argument. It seems to me to be both illogical and fallacious.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNAMARA in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. BUSH. In the absence of this treaty, will not this entire area be open to exploration and exploitation by the Soviets, without restraint? Would not they then have as much access to the area as we or anyone else would? It seems to me the danger lies in the absence of a treaty, whereas if there is a treaty the situation will be frozen and there will be some possibility of legal action in the event of exploitation by one of the members of the treaty organization.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator's argument would apply to any part of South America or to the Caribbean area or, more immediately, to Cuba. What keeps the Soviets out of Cuba, today? It is the Monroe Doctrine. It is the knowledge that the United States has announced a policy of resisting any intrusion by European powers into Cuba.

That is what would keep the Soviets out of this area, which is so vital to us, in the Antarctic. Secretary Hull extended the Monroe Doctrine to this part of the Antarctic Continent. But now it is proposed that we abandon the Monroe Doctrine, as regards Antarctica, and allow it to be open to exploitation by any of these 12 nations or by any other nations on the earth.

If we are not willing to fight for our security wherever it is involved, we might as well surrender now.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCGEE in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. In stating that we would abandon all our rights to the area and that we would abandon the application of the Monroe Doctrine to the area, what basis does the Senator from Georgia have for stating there would be any such abandonment of our rights?

Mr. RUSSELL. My position is that we have a valid claim there, today, although we have not asserted that claim. It does not matter how valid our claim is; if Russia came in now and remained there, beside us, for 30 years, when the treaty would expire, Russia would claim rights there equal to our own and would assert her claim.

The primary vice of this entire matter has been the failure to assert our claim in this area when we have a valid right to it.

No, Mr. President, the strategic factor involved in the Antarctic becomes readily apparent to all when we recognize what undoubtedly would happen in the event of war—namely, that the Panama Canal and the Suez Canal would be closed or destroyed. If the Suez Canal were lost to the free nations of the West, it would mean that ships sailing to and from the Atlantic and Indian Oceans would pass between the tip of Africa and the Antarctic. Although the width of the passage is considerable, it would still be imperative that control of the Antarctic mainland and waters remain in Western hands in order to protect the lines of communication and supply between Western Europe and the East.

But the problem would be infinitely more acute were we, for any reason, denied the use of the Panama Canal. In that likelihood, passage to and from the Atlantic and Pacific would be by way of the Drake Passage—a 500-mile-wide waterway between Cape Horn and the Palmer Peninsula. Earlier today the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] adverted to that.

Mr. President, if access to that waterway were denied to the United States and to Western Nation shipping under any circumstances, we would have suffered a great disaster, one which would be irrevocable.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. Earlier today, I asked a question which I would like to repeat now, in order to obtain a direct answer by the distinguished Senator from Georgia: Is it not true that under the proposed treaty, if it were to go into effect, the Russians would have a complete right to establish an airbase for exploratory purposes or scientific purposes in the Palmer Peninsula, and is it not true that such an airbase could be quickly converted for military purposes in the event of a war emergency?

Mr. RUSSELL. A military plane can land on the same base that a civilian plane can land on, and it undoubtedly would be used for that purpose.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes.

Mr. LAUSCHE. If the Soviet can build such a base, is it not a fact that our country also can?

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator has fallen into an error I never thought I would see befall the distinguished Senator from Ohio. He knows the United States deals in good faith, and he believes the Russians will do likewise; he is willing to place the destiny of this Nation in the good faith of the Soviets. That is where we differ. I do not trust Russia as far as I can push this Capitol. The Senator knows if we sign an agreement we will live up to it.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I concede that the most effective argument which can be made against the treaty is the assumption that the Soviet will not abide by its words. I agree theoretically with the Senator from Georgia on that point; but if we adopt that attitude forever and forever, we would never be a party to entering into any agreement, never anticipating that there is going to be a worldwide solution of the problems facing us. I would say that if there is any reason to vote against this treaty, it is on the basis of declaring that never shall we accept the word of the Soviet. I am not prepared to do that.

Mr. RUSSELL. I think the Senator narrows the issue too much. We will give the Soviets rights where they have no rights, if we ratify this treaty today. They have no just or valid claim of any kind, but we are proposing to give it to them by this treaty. If the Soviet Government is in good faith, let it sign an agreement that will allow aerial inspection of both countries, as has been proposed by the President.

This was a sunshine treaty. When this treaty was negotiated, it was on the eve of the visit of Premier Khrushchev to this country. It was a time when the Soviet was generating an aura of good will and back slapping and smiles; we were giving lavish parties for each other. It was when Mr. Khrushchev was using the charm treatment on the Western world. That was apparent from the statement of the Russian delegate who was there at the opening of the session. He referred to the great good will that was being generated then.

This treaty would apply only to our areas, not to Russia's areas. It gives Russia rights where they have none. I am willing tomorrow to have an agreement signed with Russia for total disarmament, if we can do it with safety to the United States, but I shall not by my vote approve a treaty that will endanger this country unless I know all of our rights are protected; and that is not true in this treaty.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes.

Mr. LAUSCHE. There are seven nations that have asserted claims to Antarctica, and all are signatories to this treaty. Is that correct?

Mr. RUSSELL. That is correct.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The United States and the Soviets allege that they have some basis for claims, but they have never asserted them. I concede that our bases are much stronger than those of the Soviet; but will the Senator explain to me how we are to reconcile the conflicting claims that we have even with the United Kingdom, Norway, France, New Zealand, Australia, Argentina, and Chile, all of them our friends?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes; I shall deal with that question presently. I have a proposal. I am not being merely negative in opposing this treaty. I have stated that before. I realize the conditions are there, and must be resolved if we are to solve the matter.

Mr. President, I was referring to the fact that this was a sunshine treaty, that it grew out of the hopes and aspirations for peace on the part of people everywhere. That was before Mr. Khrushchev destroyed the last hope we had for any peace, when he broke up the conference; and I pray God we will never get ourselves entrapped again without knowing what we are walking into. But just to show this is a sunshine treaty, here are the opening remarks of the Russian representative at the conference. He declared:

> At present favorable conditions are emerging in the world for more active cooperation of all states in the interests of consolidating peace and security.
>
> The visit of the Chairman of the Council of Ministers of the U.S.S.R., N. S. Khrushchev, to the United States of America, and his talks with the U.S. President, Dwight D. Eisenhower, was an important contribution to the normalization of the international situation.
> Our Conference is meeting at the moment when the trend toward warmer relations between states is discernible, and, figuratively speaking, this fair wind which has risen in the international atmosphere is favorable for our Conference and must assist in the happy sailing of our ship.

Mr. President, there was a great difference in the atmosphere of the Conference when the treaty was signed by our representative, and in world conditions today, when the Senate of the United States is called upon to ratify the treaty. I say the difference is so great that it becomes our solemn duty to reject it, and not fall into the Russian trap of the artificial atmosphere of warmth that was generated. It could have been generated in part for the purpose of getting us duped into this treaty. I would not put it past the duplicity of Khrushchev and his associates to have had that period of joviality and love and good wishes just to get us entrapped into a treaty.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. Is it not true that the United States has found it possible to reconcile and settle very important differences of opinion as to boundaries between ourselves and our greatest ally, the United Kingdom, on at least two occasions, one of which led to the motto "Fifty-four-forty or fight" in an American political campaign, and the other of which had to do with the settlement of the boundary of Alaska, after we had purchased it from Russia, so that the matter of reconciling differences in claims of land is nothing new at all or impossible of settlement?

Mr. RUSSELL. Undoubtedly the settlement of this area as a part of the free world can be enhanced if Russia is frozen out—not that she has been frozen out. She was invited in for the International Geophysical Year. But if Russia is not brought in, we can settle those differences with the other nations involved. But what hope is there to settle that controversy if Russia is in it, when we have had experience after experience? How many more times must this Nation surrender a little bit here and a little bit there? I am willing to go as far as any man and come to a complete understanding with Russia on every issue. But when an understanding is reached there must be authority and power to see that it is enforced before I will submit the future of this country, even in limited degree, to Russian good will.

There is a great deal of difference between the atmosphere that prevails today and the atmosphere that prevailed when the treaty was signed. This justifies us in taking another long look at the whole question before we take a step from which we cannot retreat. If we ratify the treaty it will be ratified. There will be no way to undo what we shall have done.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Is it not true that article X says:

> Each of the contracting parties undertakes to exert appropriate efforts, consistent—

And I emphasize—> consistent with the Charter of the United Nations, to the end that no one engages in any activity in Antarctica contrary to the principles or purposes of the present treaty.

If the Communist Chinese should go to Antarctica and should build a rocket station or a missile-tracking station or anything else, the principles of the United Nations would bar us from throwing them out forcibly without having a resolution passed by the United Nations, under article X, which Russia could veto.

Mr. RUSSELL. It is folly to state that the 12 signatories could stop such a thing. As I pointed out, the Russians already have turned over a base to Poland, without a signatory agreement, and they are reported to be getting ready to turn over another to Czechoslovakia.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. There is nothing we can do to enforce article X without going through the United Nations, and the Russians have a veto there to block any action.

Mr. RUSSELL. That is correct.

Mr. President, I have only a few minutes remaining. I was adverting, before I engaged in the discussion with my valued friend from Ohio, to the strategic importance of this area.

The treaty itself, by its very terms, as the Senator from Louisiana says, could be utilized to prevent us from taking steps necessary for our own preservation and protection.

Even without disruption of the Panama Canal, the Drake Passage is essential to the U.S. security. Anything which affects it will nullify the command of the seas, for which the American people have spent billions of dollars and on which we have lavished our ingenuity and genius. Loss of our defensive rights in the Antarctic will impair seriously the mobility and maneuverability of our naval striking force.

Mr. President, the modernized aircraft carrier long ago outgrew the Panama Canal. To shift from one ocean to another our latest carriers must pass between the tip of South America and the Palmer Peninsula of Antarctica. That is not a military secret, Jane's Fighting Ships publishes the size of every vessel. Every nation in the world knows the size of the Panama Canal. We have 22 aircraft carriers now in operation and 3 under construction that cannot pass through the Panama Canal.

As a matter of interest, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the names of these vessels, which constitute the very heart of our mobile striking force on the seas, be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

VESSELS PROHIBITED BY SIZE FROM USE OF PANAMA CANAL

Fourteen CVA—large attack carriers: the Independence, the Saratoga, the Midway, the Coral Sea, the Bon Homme Richard, the Ticonderoga, the Shangri-La, the Ranger, the Forrestal, the F. D. Roosevelt, the Oriskany, the Lexington, the Intrepid, the Hancock.

Seven CVS: the Kearsarge, the Bennington, the Wasp, the Essex, the Randolph, the Hornet, the Yorktown.

One training carrier: the Antietam.

Three under construction: the Kitty Hawk, the Constellation, the Enterprise.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, my time is about up. I hope the Senate will prayerfully and carefully measure up to its constitutional responsibilities. There are a few matters, Mr. President, to which I should briefly refer.

In the first place, to those who speak about this being a conflict between the ancient age and the modern times, I would point out once again that Franklin D. Roosevelt, considered to be somewhat of a modernist in his time, was preparing to lay claim to sovereignty over this entire area at the time World War II began.

I further point out, Mr. President, that since World War II, as the Congress has authorized these missions to the Antarctic it has been for the express purpose of asserting U.S. sovereignty. Despite all that, Mr. President, we have made no claims. We say now we shall make no claims. We say that our $250 million expended on exploration and the lives of the Americans who died in undertaking to build the future security of this country shall be pooled with a Russian claim, which the Russians made at a conference, that 2 days before the Britisher sailed in the Antarctic a Russian did.

I referred earlier to the fact that the Russians have claimed everything. They claim they discovered radio, invented the airplane, and everything else. I would like to read a story datelined from London, June 15.

The Russian claim said the sixth continent was discovered by a Russian expedition January 28, 1820, 2 days before the Briton generally credited with the feat—Lt. Edward Bransfield—got there.

The claim was advanced by Vladimir Lebedev, an Antarctic explorer and secretary of the Soviet National Antarctic Committee.

Mr. President, are we to lend encouragement to these spurious claims against our vital national interests by the ratification of such a treaty as this?

Mr. President, time and again during the consideration of this treaty my thoughts have drifted back to Thomas Jefferson and the purchase of the Louisiana territory, and to William Seward's acquisition of Alaska. That may be old-fashioned, Mr. President. It may be the modern trend to give Russia a great deal and to try to work with Russia, but I will take my place with Jefferson, with Seward, and with those who contributed to the sovereignty of the United States and to the building of these United States, rather than adopting any idea that we will accomplish anything by collaboration with the Soviet Union. In those times these purchases were considered by some to be unmitigated folly, but they were actually acts of great vision. They were acts of courage. Today they shine down through the pages of history, and even into the timidity of the present hour, as great beacons that mark the forward movement of American civilization.

These men were unafraid to take bold action to promote the interests of the nation even at the risk of unpopularity. We are determining America's future here. Within the next hour we shall have an opportunity to take bold action at the risk of temporary unpopularity by refusing to sacrifice and to surrender, through this treaty, the rights which are based upon American daring and the expenditure of American lives and American money.

Mr. President, I shall briefly outline what I think the Senate should do.

First and foremost, we should reject this treaty on the vote which is to be had within the next hour or so.

After we reject the treaty, we should instruct the State Department to express immediately a claim to our valid rights in this vast continent, rights that are ours on the basis of all the standards that have historically been used for establishing claims to title all over the world—rights based on exploration, on discovery, and on longer occupation than any other country can establish.

Mr. President, in order that there will be no enemy interlopers, we should immediately reaffirm the Hull declaration of 1940, saying that the American republics, from Canada to Cape Horn, have a vital interest in this area, warning the aggressive nations of the earth to stay out.

Then, Mr. President, we should call a conference of the seven friendly powers that have asserted claims to this area.

They are our friends and allies. We will get along much better in negotiating with them than we would if Russia were at the conference table.

What does Russia do at every meeting it attends? It tries to plant the seeds of discord. It tries to create trouble, and it will create trouble if a question should ever arise with respect to the sixth continent.

Let us reject this treaty and sit with our friends among the seven claimant nations to solve this problem. It can be done. There are conflicting claims in some areas, but they can be settled by negotiation, by an exchange of lands and, indeed, by purchase if necessary, as was done in the case of the Louisiana Purchase and in the case of the purchase of Alaska. We shall never do it if we invite Soviet Russia to the table, as is proposed in this treaty.

There are many other alternatives. I have never been more serious in my life, Mr. President. I say we should reject this treaty and, if necessary, to arrange a conference with the seven other claimants immediately for the control, protection, defense, and administration of these lands during the time of the negotiations, or in the event it is impossible to negotiate.

If we bring the greatest enemy to the American way of life—Soviet Russia—into this picture, we will have destroyed any hope of ever settling the question, and we will have done violence to future generations of Americans yet unborn. This treaty should be rejected.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I am glad to yield whatever time I have remaining.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. As a member of the Foreign Relations Committee, I did not protest this treaty being reported from the committee. As a member of other committees, I found it impossible to attend some sessions of the hearings on this treaty. I ask only that there be sufficient delay so that Senators who are opposed to the treaty may have time to prepare their case.

I have since reviewed the record, and I find that the vital questions raised on the floor were for the most part not answered in the committee. I see Mr. Macomber, one of the able representatives of the State Department, in the gallery from time to time. I assume he is undertaking to give private answers to some who may not know otherwise.

But we have before us the record of the hearings that were held. The record shows that there was a morning session at which eight Senators were present, which was less than a quorum. That session lasted for 2 hours. Of the eight Senators present, five asked questions during the course of the hearing, which would indicate that perhaps all eight were not able to remain throughout the hearings, since they probably had somewhat the same problem that confronted the junior Senator from Louisiana.

Other committees were meeting, and the Senate was in session all day. Then there was a brief evening session which lasted for 2 hours and 15 minutes. In that time we had less information adduced than the Senator from Georgia has presented to us today in a single presentation of one side of the issue. A total period of about 4 hours and 15 minutes was devoted to the morning and afternoon sessions. There were five Senators present that afternoon.

One of the five, of course, was the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CARLSON] who had been an adviser when this subject was considered. He would undoubtedly know a great deal about the subject and would perhaps not need the benefit of the hearings.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Georgia has expired. The proponents have 48 minutes remaining.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I thank the distinguished Senator. The junior Senator from Louisiana was compelled to vote on this matter somewhat in the dark, and did so as a courtesy to other Senators. In view of the gravity of this question, it seems to me more study is required before we undertake to approve the treaty. The record we have is scanty, in the light of the many serious questions that have been raised affecting the very vital security interest of this country.

As the Senator from Georgia has pointed out, this is a "sunshine" treaty. I believe it was negotiated immediately after Khrushchev's visit to this country. His visit came in September or October, and this treaty was negotiated within 60 days of Khrushchev's visit, at a time when people felt that Khrushchev was not a bad fellow, and before he resumed his rattling of his rockets at us.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, with regard to the last comment of the Senator from Louisiana, of course, the chairman has no way to compel the attendance of members at a committee meeting. All chairmen know that. These meetings were held in the usual order. The ones who were interested were present and attended. We have the record before us. It consists of 101 pages. We had the representatives of the State Department and the Department of Defense; also scientists and independent authorities on international law, for example, from Columbia University; and also public witnesses. Any public witness who was willing and desirous to appear could do so.

I do not believe there is anything sketchy about the hearings. With all deference, the statements made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], in my opinion, are not information on this subject. Many of them are quite irrelevant. As an example, he makes much of the Monroe Doctrine. He seems to forget that more than half of Antarctica is not even in the Western Hemisphere. I do not know what he proposes to do about the part which is in the Eastern Hemisphere. He will have to create some new doctrine to cover that area.

I do not accept the statement that this record is incomplete or inadequate in any respect. I think it is an excellent record. The Antarctic Treaty, of course, was prepared and negotiated under the direction of one of the ablest men in this country, Mr. Herman Phleger, with the assistance of two of the Members of this body, and the usual assistance from the State Department.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. One moment. I may say the Navy was represented. A Captain Davis was present and participated at all times. All these proposals were cleared with the Department of Defense, and it approved them.

I now yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I would not wish to see the impression go out, if it should go out as a result of the observations of the distinguished Senator from Louisiana, that this or other matters which come before the Senate do not receive proper consideration. Attendance at committee hearings is a matter of an individual Senator's diligence, for one thing; but all the documents are constantly available. This subject has been before the committee for some time.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Since February, when it came to the committee.

Mr. DIRKSEN. It is easy to let the impression go out that the treaty has been very hastily and sketchily considered. I do not deem that to be the case at all, and particularly so by virtue of the well-rounded and completely documented statements which have been made on the floor of the Senate in this debate.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I thank the Senator. I believe he is quite correct. I believe the situation is somewhat similar to the occasional story we hear, to the effect that the Senate passed a bill with only 6 or 10 Senators present. Usually such bills are private bills or bills agreed upon in committee, and they can always be presented in the fashion described. This treaty was considered in the usual course, with the staff work and the attention of committee members in exactly the same way in which all treaties are considered.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. It is my belief, based upon my experience of 3½ years in the Senate and in connection with hearings held by the Committee on Foreign Relations, that if we are to heed the argument made by the Senator from Louisiana in this instance, we will have to heed it in instance after instance when measures are brought before us on the floor of the Senate.

I venture to say that in these hearings there was a greater attendance than is normally the case. If we are to accept the Senator's argument, we will find that in instance after instance the same argument can be made, that there were not enough Senators present. I observed that yesterday, in the absence of a quorum at subcommitee hearing, a measure was acted upon. What are we going to do when that question comes before us? A quorum of four members was necessary, and three members were present, and action was taken.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. The Senator knows, does he not, that he himself has insisted, as a customary thing, and has granted time, as chairman, for members of the committee to study a matter and to decide what position they will take on it, and to give them an opportunity to submit minority views. In this instance the junior Senator from Louisiana was willing to waive that customary courtesy and to have the treaty reported to the Senate without further consideraion, because we were in the closing days of the last session.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Yes; I have not criticized the Senator for his action. That is quite true. The Senator was not in favor of the treaty, but he consented to allowing it to be voted upon and reported to the Senate. That is true. The only point I am making is that I disagree with the Senator from Louisiana that the hearings were not adequate and that the treaty did not receive proper consideration. I believe that with the exception of the Senator from Louisiana, virtually all the other members of the committee were present when we voted on the treaty.

I yield 10 minutes to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I should like first to say that, as one of the eight members of the committee who attended the hearings of the Committee on Foreign Relations when it considered the proposed Antarctic Treaty, I consider eight to be a pretty good number of members to be present. It is not necessary to have a quorum present in order to hold a hearing, as everyone knows. Nearly all the members of the committee were present, as the chairman says, when we reported the bill to the Senate. As I recall, only one Senator, the Senator from California, of all those who have registered their opposition to the treaty on the floor of the Senate, made any objection to it at the time of the hearings. Apparently things have transpired since then which have made others decide to oppose the treaty.

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a correction?

Mr. AIKEN. I yield.

Mr. ENGLE. The Senator from Alaska [Mr. GRUENING] was also present.

Mr. AIKEN. Yes; the Senator from Alaska has objected to it. I said that of all the Senators who have opposed the treaty on the floor the Senator from California was the only one who opposed the treaty at the hearing.

I believe that all of us who attended the hearings were in a rather critical mood with respect to the treaty. I did not know whether it was a good treaty. I had heard some objections voiced to it. In fact, I knew what the objections were. Therefore, in committee some of us raised those points with the witnesses who came before us. The objections were satisfactorily met and explained. So when the time came to vote, I voted with the majority of the committee to report the treaty favorably.

I can enumerate on the fingers of one hand the points which have been raised against the treaty. First there is the objection that we would surrender territorial claims if we ratified the treaty. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. LAUSCHE] has clearly explained that we do not surrender any basis for territorial claims. We say so in the treaty.

We say no one can assert or use that authority during the next 30-year period, or expand or make claims which have not been made up to this point.

The second objection that has been raised is that Russia will not keep her agreements. It is said that we would agree to do certain things or not to do certain things, and that, although, Russia would also agree, she would not live up to her agreement.

Russia does not have to sign the treaty. She can go to Antarctica now if she wants to do so, and she can test bombs, she can establish missile bases, and build airports. I believe that all the nations interested down there are using airplanes. Therefore, we are not giving up anything in that respect.

The third point that is raised is that under the treaty Red China will be able to go there and establish bases. Well, Red China can go into Antarctica today. There is nothing to prevent Red China from going there. However, if the treaty is approved, then these 12 nations of the world are bound together to keep Red China, or any other country, from going there and establishing bases from which to attack anyone.

I believe it is a good treaty. It provides for open inspections. For the first time we have a treaty which provides for open inspections, as open as it is possible to get them. That provision is written into the treaty. We provide in the treaty for open inspections. If the other nations agree to the treaty and we agree to it, at least we can try that principle in the great Antarctic area.

As to the Soviets establishing bases, I suppose it is possible for the Soviets to go to Antarctica and establish missile bases or airfields if they have enough money or the desire to do it. But why should the Soviet Union or any other country go to Antarctica to establish a base from which to attack the United States or any nation allied with us?

It is common knowledge that Russia has the potential today, through long-range bombers and long-range missiles, to land nuclear warheads on the great military establishments in Florida, Georgia, California, Connecticut, Washington, and elsewhere from closer points of vantage than she would have in Antarctica. Why would she wish to build bases down there? Maybe she would; I do not know. On the other hand, we acknowledge that even without them she could destroy our war potential in the States I have mentioned and in other States as well. Of course, we could retaliate; we could plaster Russia.

We could plaster Odessa and Leningrad and Moscow and Kiev and Vladivostok, and the other great centers of Russia. We could plaster them with atom bombs.

Is that the answer to our problem? Is ultimate destruction of a large part of the world's habitable surface the answer? Is the destruction of hundreds of millions of people the only solution that we can look to in order to cure us and other nations of deep suspicions? Is there not some other answer?

The world is in turmoil today. It is in turmoil in Africa and Asia and almost everywhere else. It is in turmoil largely as a result, among other factors, of the intense propaganda being carried on by the great nations of the world. There is tension everywhere today. What are we going to do about it?

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AIKEN. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I think the Senator has raised a most important question: Is destruction necessary? Here is a place where a number of nations—12—on our initiative are trying to work out a mutually satisfactory agreement which will, in effect, demilitarize this sixth continent and create a situation by means of which good faith can once again be established.

We know that there are very few untroubled spots left in the world today. Here is an agreement we have started on our own initiative. Here is something which we have proposed. The Senate has been represented by the distinguished Senator from Kansas [Mr. CARLSON] and the distinguished Senator from Wyoming [Mr. MCGEE].

I hope that we will follow the reasoning of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations [Mr. FULBRIGHT] and the distinguished Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN] and will give full and due consideration to this proposal, which means so much, because it may well be a starting point toward an eventual peaceful solution of the difficulties which confront us today.

Mr. AIKEN. I thank the Senator from Montana. It is possible that if we approve the agreement, Russia may violate it, or some other country may violate it. But if Russia violates the treaty, she is violating a treaty made with 11 other countries of the world, not with the United States alone. That puts us in a decidedly stronger position.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. AIKEN. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Following up the significant point being made by the Senator from Vermont, is it not true that for a matter of many months the United States has been undertaking to hold in Geneva, Switzerland, with other nations, a disarmament conference?

Mr. AIKEN. Yes.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Is it not true that in Geneva, Switzerland, for many months, we have also been undertaking to hold, with other nations, a conference seeking to bring about an end to nuclear testing?

Mr. AIKEN. That is true.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Based on inspection?

Mr. AIKEN. That is correct.

Mr. MANSFIELD. What does this treaty have in store? What does the treaty agree to? For the first time, the things which the United States of America has been advocating over the years are given consideration. The complete right of unilateral inspection insures the fulfillment of these objectives. In other words, we are getting disarmament through demilitarization and are getting the right to unilateral inspection in the sixth continent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Vermont has expired.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, may I have 2 additional minutes?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield 2 additional minutes to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, the treaty provides for the very things we have been demanding from Russia. So far as I know, there has been unanimous agreement on these in the Senate. I have heard no objection to these demands.

The world is watching the U.S. Senate today. What we do here will have a profound effect not only upon our future but also upon the future of all the people of the world. This is our opportunity to lessen world tension. It is an opportunity which we have not had up to this time. If we reject the treaty, it will be charged that we want no peace in the world, not even in that area covered by 200 feet of ice; that we want to rule the world by force. Much of the world will believe that charge. It will be charged that we wish to maintain tension over the world at a high level for economic reasons. Much of the world will believe that charge too. Many of the people of the world will believe it.

Mr. President, we need a strong defense. I feel free to talk today because, to the best of my knowledge, I have never voted against a recommendation made by the chairman of the Committee on Armed Services [Mr. RUSSELL] since he has been the chairman of that committee. Therefore, I feel free to talk. But I want the right to talk of peace. I want to think of peace and then talk about it once in a while and work for it.

We cannot carry hate and suspicion on our backs forever, unless we are to achieve the final end of total destruction.

The world today is waiting to hear from us. It is waiting to hear what the Senate will do. Let us show, through the ratification of the treaty, that we stand ready to join with others to secure the future of mankind. Let that new start toward peace begin right now.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I yield 10 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, yesterday I spoke rather in detail, analyzing the treaty and its provisions, which clearly and concisely declare that there shall be no change of rights possessed by any signatory to the treaty, if and when it is finally adopted. I do not contemplate discussing that phase of the question now. I shall take up the subject of the nations which are interested.

Seven nations have asserted claims based upon discoveries. That is the method, under international law, where a discovery is built up into a claim upon which territorial sovereignty can eventually be based.

The United Kingdom is one of those nations. The United Kingdom made its claims in 1908. The Palmer Peninsula is claimed by the United Kingdom. The Palmer Peninsula is that area which is a short distance from the shores of South America. Nineteen hundred and eight antedates virtually all the discoveries which were made by our country.

Our country's discoveries primarily began in 1928 through the stalwart and valiant character of a brother of the distinguished senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD]. That same area which includes the Palmer Peninsula is claimed by Argentina, on the basis of activities in 1942. That same area, in part, is claimed by Chile.

I pose the question: If we are to start deciding these adverse claims, what would be the result? Great Britain, whose discoveries were in 1908; Argentina, whose discoveries were in 1942; and Chile, whose discoveries were in 1940; in full, or in some degree, laid claim to what is known as the Palmer Peninsula.

I now go to another area, this are being claimed by Norway. Norway entered the area in 1939.

The next area is the space claimed by Australia in 1933. The next is the space claimed by France, in 1924.

Finally, there is the space and area claimed by New Zealand, in 1923.

In spite of the eloquent and impressive argument made by the Senator from Georgia, I submit that these conflicting claims, unless there is a combined effort made to adjust them, can precipitate untold grief and devastation in the world.

It might be said that I have not mentioned the United States or the Soviet Union. There is not one syllable of evidence in the RECORD that the United States ever laid official claim to any part of the Antarctic.

The Soviet Union, through a man by the name of Thaddeus Von Bellingshausen, did some sailing along the coast of Antarctica in, I think, about 1820. Our country had in that early period a man named Palmer, who in a sailing vessel went down the coast and asserted the discovery.

In 1839, I believe, there was Lieutenant Wilkes who sighted a part of the land now claimed by Australia and named after him.

The United States became active in about 1928. We never asserted a claim to any part of Antarctica.

I point out that there is a difference in international law in considering what is the basis of a claim and what is an actual claim. We have the basis for a claim; and in the event it is deemed desirable to do so, we can convert it into an actual claim. But when we do, we shall run head on into conflict with the United Kingdom, Norway, France, New Zealand, Australia, Argentina, and Chile.

Mr. President, I listened very attentively to the argument which was made. Certainly we should consult with our South American friends and allies, and should evolve a plan which will be in the interest of both our allies and our own country.

On that score let me point out that in 1959 these seven nations, which have claims to Antarctica, met. These seven nations—the United Kingdom, Norway, France, New Zealand, Australia, Argentina, and Chile—are our allies. In consultation, these nations, after considering their mutual security, the minerals which might be extracted from Antarctica, the military advantages which might be had, and the possibility that at some time in the future the 2-mile ice shelf might be eliminated, and populations might be established there—after considering all those factors—declared that in the interest of peace and in the interest of their countries and in the interest of our country, this area should be declared an international neutralized zone.

What is the alternative? Either we shall make it an international neutralized zone devoted to scientific research and free from military bases and military equipment, on the one hand, or we shall begin to fight with the seven nations which have conflicting claims and we shall begin to be involved in arguments with the Soviet Union.

How is Antarctica to be divided?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time yielded to the Senator from Ohio has expired.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield 2 more minutes to me?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield 2 more minutes to the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio is recognized for 2 additional minutes.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, the argument that we should consult with our allies is a sound one, and we have done so. We have met with them; and, following that consideration of the facts, the distilled judgment was that this area should be declared an international neutralized zone and should be devoted to scientific research.

In conclusion, let me say that all of us want peace and are working in the interest of peace. I constantly receive letters in which I am asked why our country is expanding its armaments and why our Government does not devote to peaceful purposes those great amounts of money. It is argued that by establishing a world court and international police we would eliminate the great cost and the travail and the sacrifice of lives which result from war. As pointed out by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN], this huge area has not yet been occupied by mankind, and is not yet the subject of disputes because of ethnographic differences or economic interests. This is a pristine area capable of being dealt with by means of the treaty which now is before us.

Mr. President, I shall cast my vote in favor of ratification of the treaty. I shall do so without any doubt in my own mind. I shall do so on the basis of my ability to analyze the facts involved and to understand the propriety of ratification of the treaty by the Senate. I shall do so in the belief that my country will thus be served.

I yield the floor.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, how much time remains under my control?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventeen minutes.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield 7 minutes to the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York is recognized for 7 minutes.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I rise in support of the pending treaty.

I do not wish to repeat the arguments which already have been made in this Chamber. Instead, I desire to identify myself with the most eloquent arguments which have been made by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], the distinguished chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN], and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. LAUSCHE], who have carried on this battle most manfully for all of us.

It is now my purpose to emphasize a cardinal point which I believe is important for all of us to understand; namely, that the personality of our country is here in question, because the treaty was negotiated upon the initiative of the United States. In this instance the United States is willing to take this chance because it believes it has enough character and enough skill and enough competence to understand that it is not being "taken"—and I use that word in its colloquial sense—in the case of this treaty.

This matter, Mr. President, is most important to the entire world. The rest of the world is worried because it believes the leadership strength of the United States has been weakened as a result of recent attitudes taken by our country. That situation is apparent to all of us who have traveled abroad and have engaged in international negotiations—as have I, through the kindness of our minority leader, in serving as Chairman of the Economic Committee of the NATO Parliamentarians.

In that connection I have had the privilege of working with representatives of the other NATO countries and, therefore, I understand something about what is troubling these other countries at this time over the attitude and the position of our country. It is the fear that we really do not know what we want, and that our suspicion about the Russians—which is entirely justified—is paralyzing our will and our judgment to such an extent that we cannot be relied upon to lead the world as we are entitled to do and as we should do. In short, the other nations are convinced that today we do not know what we want.

But, Mr. President, in this case we do know what we want. I say we want this treaty to go into effect, and I say we want that to happen because the treaty is no danger either to the United States or to the rest of the free world. So we want the treaty to go into effect. We believe the treaty should be ratified, instead of saying to the President of our country, who is responsible for the conduct of our foreign affairs, "You may know what our country wants, but we do not think we do."

Mr. President, it seems to me that nothing would harm us more in the eyes of the other nations of the world than if we were to say that to our President, in connection with this significant area. In regard to it, we say we know exactly what we want, because we are proceeding with our eyes open, and we think we have some brains, to; and we are willing to take this risk in dealing with the Russians.

Certainly, this is the first instance in which we can enter with the Russians into an international agreement which has such correlative obligations, one dependent upon the other. Under the treaty we will be able to do many things, also, that will do us a great deal of good.

Mr. President, the important point for us to bear in mind is that in this case the United States knows what it wants and is prepared to deal on a proper basis with the requirements of the present situation; it is not troubled by hobgoblins about its own alleged inadequacy or about not knowing what it wants or about not being able to protect itself.

Today we live under that shadow; but we shall dispel it by resoundingly ratifying this treaty.

Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Arkansas for yielding this time to me.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Connecticut.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut is recognized for 2 minutes.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I wish to make two points in connection with the treaty, which I support.

First, I have repeatedly asked, What is the alternative if we do not ratify this treaty and put it in effect? It seems to me that the alternative is to leave open to the world, including the Soviet Union, the right to explore and to exploit in the Antarctic to their heart's content.

The value of this treaty is to freeze the position of the 12 parties in the Antarctic. To me that would be a great step forward for the United States.

My second point is this. We have talked for a long time, and very vociferously, about equal justice under law in this world. It is one of the great aims of the United States and of the free world to promote equal justice under law. I believe this treaty is a move in that direction, and an important move. We have shown a willingness to join with these other nations in a treaty, which is the supreme law of the land under the Constitution. We have shown good faith. We have shown we mean what we say about equal justice under law, and we have indicated we are willing to submit disputes under this treaty to the International Court of Justice; although I understand three of the participants have not been willing to go that far. Nevertheless, we have shown our good faith. I think if we fail to ratify the treaty, it will be an indication to the world that the Senate of the United States does not mean what it says so often on this floor—that we favor equal justice under law.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Minnesota.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota is recognized for 2 minutes.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I sincerely believe that the Antarctica Treaty is a great contribution to peace. I am proud that the United States was the initiator of this treaty, and I am confident that the Senate will support this initiative.

The Soviet Union has established its presence in Antarctica, and the only way to remove it would be by the use of force, an action which no Senator would approve. Although this treaty does not remove the Soviet presence from the Antarctica, it does insure that this presence will not be used by the Kremlin for purposes hostile to the interests of the United States. The signatories of the treaty agree to prevent the use of Antarctica for military purposes by prohibiting fortifications, military bases, and weapons, from the continent. We have no reason to trust the word of the Soviet Union now any more than in the past. But this treaty gives us the right to enforce the Soviet promises by sending inspection observers anywhere in Antarctica at any time. I am sure that all of us believe that if this inspection right of the Antarctica Treaty were extended to the Soviet Union, Red China, and the rest of the Communist world, the chance of war would be greatly diminished. Such a situation, however, is unlikely in the near future. But there is ample reason to believe that if we ratify this treaty, a precedent will be made which will serve as a useful model for future agreements on outer space.

There have been some fears that the United States by this treaty will give away the part of Antarctica which is its due by right of exploration. Nothing could be further from the truth. The signatories agreed that nothing in the treaty shall be interpreted as either a renunciation or recognition of claims or bases of claims to territorial sovereignty. The whole tangled claims question is therefore set aside. I am confident that the Senate will not resurrect this problem by postponing or denying ratification of the Antarctica Treaty. I am confident that by approving this treaty the Senate will show the world that regardless of the warm or cold winds blowing from Moscow this country knows its true interest demands that it always take all steps conducive to peace.

I would also at this time like to invite the attention of my colleagues to an excellent statement in support of the Antarctica Treaty by Dr. Charles M. Herzfeld, president of the Catholic Association for International Peace. I ask unanimous consent that this statement be inserted at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT ON THE ANTARCTIC TREATY BY DR. CHARLES M. HERZFELD, PRESIDENT, CATHOLIC ASSOCIATION FOR INTERNATIONAL PEACE

The Antarctic Treaty now before the U.S. Senate for ratification offers an opportunity to extend the rule of international law to new areas of the world. It prohibits the use of the Antarctic for military activities of any kind, and bans nuclear explosions there. To enforce these bans, all signatories agree to unlimited inspection of all activities in the area, by any signatory nation, without any veto power. Any disputes not resolved by the signatories can be brought before the International Court of Justice. Finally, the treaty preserves the status quo with respect to territorial rights in the area.

Critics of the treaty oppose it principally on the grounds that the treaty is said to invite the Soviet Union into the Antarctic, and is said to jeopardize U.S. territorial rights there. This "invitation" of the Soviets is supposed to lead to the establishment of Soviet bases there, posing a grave threat to the free world, and is supposed to hand over important sources of raw materials to the Soviets.

These criticisms seem, on the whole, unwarranted. The Soviet Union is in fact present now in the Antarctic, and could be dislodged only by major military action. The treaty recognizes this presence, and attempts to regulate it. The United States has never made a territorial claim in the area, but has reserved the right to do so. The treaty would prevent the United States from making new territorial claims, but would also prevent the Soviet Union from making any claims.

Arguments based on fear of Soviet bases in the Antarctic are unfounded. The Soviet Union now has bases in existence in many parts of the globe which pose much greater threats to the free world than would fancied bases in the Antarctic. Fears of Soviet economic exploitation fail to take into account the enormous logistical difficulties which would be involved, as well as the fact that the United States does not give up its own rights to any possible future economic development there.

Finally, critics oppose the prohibition of all nuclear explosions in the area. Yet this prohibition is coupled with the right of all treaty powers to free and unlimited inspection of all parts of the area, including ships and airplanes. In this respect the treaty would be a unique international experiment in full nuclear disarmament in a selected part of the world.

The President of the United States stated, at the time of the signing of the treaty: "The Antarctic Treaty and the guarantees it embodies constitute a significant advance toward the goal of a peaceful world with justice." In these times of crisis, ratification of the treaty would be in the larger national interest and would extend the rule of international law.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I yield the remaining time to myself. There is not a great deal left to be said——

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Yes.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I cannot let this opportunity go by, in connection with the treaty, without saying that the Senator from Arkansas has given very intelligent, zealous, and statesmanlike leadership to the piloting of this treaty in committee and on the floor. I simply want to congratulate the Senator because of his understanding.

I also wish to congratulate other members of the Foreign Relations Committee. As the Senator from Vermont said at the outset today, some of them had serious questions about this treaty, but as they got into it and studied it, they became convinced it is the only thing we can do and it is the thing we must do in the interest of international relations and our own best interests.

We ourselves are giving up nothing. We are permitting no one else to acquire anything beyond that which they have at the moment. It is the first great milestone of this particular type in international conduct I know of.

I again congratulate the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I thank the Senator from Iowa very much for his kind words. I may say, with all sincerity, that without his help I am certain we would not have been able to bring it to this point. I hope the treaty will be approved. If it is, I know much of the credit for it will be due to the efforts of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. President, this is a complicated treaty. It is a unique treaty. It has in it features which we have been attempting to obtain in other areas of the world, and have failed. I think for that reason alone it is worthwhile, although that is not the only reason at all.

There are two or three items I should mention, although I believe the debate has developed all of the significant ones. There is one aspect of this question with regard to our allies in Latin America. We are very much concerned about Latin America at the moment. The administration has proposed a large if amorphous, new program in that area. We have already done a great deal to assist our allies and our friends in Latin America.

Both Chile and Argentina are involved in this question. Both have substantial claims in Antarctica. They were reluctant in the first instance to agree to this treaty, and if we should renege on it now—if we should reject it—I think it would prove to be very embarrassing to them.

The same could be said, of course, of Australia and New Zealand. We are not as much concerned about them at the moment, simply because they do not need assistance, and they are not so much embroiled in international tensions.

It seems to me there is another important aspect of this question. If we reject this treaty, I think the Russians, who have been spoken of so much here today, would be justified in saying, "Well, the only reason the United States objects is that they intend to build bases there. They intend to make some military use of it." That would be a natural suspicion. If they did entertain that suspicion, and if we rejected the treaty, there is nothing under existing conditions, to prevent their attempting to build bases. They have scientific stations there. They came there really at the invitation of the international community of scientists to take part in the International Geophysical Year. I think rejection of the treaty would be tantamount in their eyes telling them that we intend to build bases there.

Finally, what bothered me very much about the opening remarks of the distinguished Senator from Georgia was that, in saying he thought we should judge these matters as to their effect upon the welfare of this country, he left the implication that the committee and myself and others had not been concerned about the welfare of this country. I think it is very clear that those who proposed the treaty and negotiated it—including the members of the Defense Department, not forgetting Captain Davis, who actually participated—were just as much interested in the welfare of this country as anybody was.

To leave the implication that those who are proposing this treaty are only offhandedly interested in the welfare of our country is, I think, quite unfair and unjustified. There is plenty of room for an honest difference of opinion, of course, as to whether or not the treaty is in the national interest. I have no doubt at all it is in the national interest. We are, in effect, preserving the right to exercise control by inspection and by restrictions upon other nations throughout the whole of Antarctica, a very large area. On the other hand, if we reject the treaty and go the alternative route of trying to establish individual sovereign rights over a small part of Antarctica, we almost automatically give up any rights over the rest of it.

It is generally stated in the testimony that there is some 20 percent of the continent, in the area called Marie Byrd Land, which has not yet been claimed. So it is probable that we would lose our interest in the rest of it, our right to travel about and to utilize it for scientific purposes.

The real value, clearly, is the right to make scientific investigations, to obtain weather data and so on, which are of value to all nations, whether they are members of the particular group of 12 signatories or not. I think we are preserving the real value. As Dr. Gould said, he would not give a nickel for all the mineral resources yet discovered; he felt the valuable export was scientific information.

It seems to me we have now an opportunity to make an agreement which is a step forward. It may not work out. We cannot guarantee it will. The agreement may be violated. We will be no worse off if the agreement is violated than we are today. If it is violated in any substantial manner, every member would be released from his obligations. I do not believe the agreement will be violated. I think it is worthwhile that we take the chance.

I think the only real justification for opposing ratification of the treaty can be based upon the assumption that it is impossible ever to make an agreement in this field with the Communists. I will agree with the Senator from Georgia and with other Senators who have stated that the Russians have not had a good record at all. Of course, they have not. I have not yet reached the conclusion that it is impossible to reach an agreement and that war is inevitable. It seems to me the wise policy is to continue to try.

There is a vast difference between making an agreement over this unpopulated land and testing out the good faith of the Russians, and trying to make one in regard to the home lands of our respective countries. I have often found that in instances connected with the United Nations, and in other cases, we evidence a great reluctance to abolish the veto, or to give up rights we expect other people to relinquish. In any case, it is a very complicated matter to give this kind of right to a fully developed country.

It is not that I am not in favor of such a thing, and I wish we were able to do so in other areas. This is a starting place. It would be a great tragedy to relinquish it and to reject it at this late date.

I think it would expose us justifiably to the charge that we are hypocrites, that we do not mean what we say, that we are unwilling to make an agreement for the inspection and the control of armaments even in an area covered with a great icecap approximately a mile thick. I think it would be a great tragedy to reject the treaty.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I should like to ask the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations if it is not true, as the distinguished senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] stated, that the control and the conduct of our foreign policy lies in the hands of the executive branch of the Government, to wit, in the hands of the President of the United States?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. That is correct.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Who was responsible for undertaking the negotiations in an endeavor to bring about the agreement now before the Senate.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Our Government was. Our Executive was.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Have any countries as yet ratified the agreement?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Five countries have ratified it. Four of them have already deposited their instruments of ratification.

Mr. MANSFIELD. And the other countries are waiting for us to ratify it?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I certainly believe they think that without our ratification it will not be an effective treaty. I think that is extremely important. I was a little surprised that five countries have already ratified.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I wish to point out that the United Kingdom ratified the treaty, and its claims antedate, precede, and are superior to ours.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I will say, in conclusion, if I may, that the Senate was represented at the hearings.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I demand the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time for debate has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Without objection, the treaty will be considered as having passed through its various parliamentary stages up to the point of consideration of the resolution of ratification.

The resolution of ratification of Executive B (86th Cong., 2d sess.), the Antarctic Treaty, signed at Washington on December 1, 1959, will now be read.

The resolution of ratification of Executive B was read, as follows:

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of Executive B, 86th Congress, 2d session, the Antarctic Treaty, signed at Washington on December 1, 1959, by the Plenipotentiaries of the United States of America and eleven other countries.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, will the Senate advise and consent to the resolution of ratification of the treaty? On this question, the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BURDICK (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON]. If he were present and voting, he would vote "nay"; if I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea." I withhold my vote.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS] is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON] also if present and voting, the Senator from Missouri would vote "yea," and the Senator from South Carolina would vote "nay."

Mr. MORSE (when his name was called). On this vote I am associated with the Senator from Utah [Mr. Moss] in a pair with the Senator from Alaska [Mr. GRUENING]. If the Senator from Alaska were present and voting, he would vote "nay"; if I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea." I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. MOSS (when his name was called). As the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] announced, we have a pair with the Senator from Alaska [Mr. GRUENING]. If the Senator from Alaska were present and voting, he would vote "nay"; if I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea." I therefore withhold my vote.

The rollcall was concluded.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from Alaska [Mr. GRUENING], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. JORDAN], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER], the Senator from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS], and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN] are absent on official business.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS] is absent because of illness.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL] is absent because of a death in the family.

On this vote, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER] and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN] are paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS]. If present and voting the Senator from Tennessee and the Senator from Alabama would vote "yea," and the Senator from Florida would vote "nay."

Mr. KUCHEL. I announce that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CASE] is necessarily absent, and, if present and voting, would vote "yea."

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. MARTIN] is absent by leave of the Senate on official business.

The yeas and nays resulted—yeas 66, nays 21, as follows:

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCGEE in the chair). Two-thirds of the Senators present having voted in the affirmative, the resolution of ratification is agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President be notified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of legislative business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of legislative business.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR CIVIL FUNCTIONS ADMINISTERED BY THE DEPARTMENT OF THE ARMY, AND FOR OTHER PURPOSES

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, in a moment I shall yield the floor, so that the minority leader may pay a justified tribute; but first I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order No. 1839, H.R. 12326.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (H.R. 12326) making appropriations for civil functions administered by the Department of the Army, certain agencies of the Department of the Interior, the Atomic Energy Commission, the Tennessee Valley Authority, and certain study commissions, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1961, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Texas.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

EIGHTY-FIRST BIRTHDAY ANNIVERSARY OF CHARLES L. WATKINS, SENATE PARLIAMENTARIAN

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I wish to call to the attention of the Senate the fact that this is the birthday anniversary of one of our most devoted, most competent, and most beloved public servants, Charles L. Watkins, our distinguished Parliamentarian. This is his 81st birthday anniversary. He has served us long and well. I know that all of us wish him happy returns of the day. [Applause, Senators rising.]

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I join with the distinguished majority leader in his tribute and his salute to the beloved Parliamentarian of this great body. May he long flourish, may his days be many, may his advice to the Chair always be right, and may we never find occasion to take exception to it. We wish him well.

EIGHTY-SIXTH BIRTHDAY ANNIVERSARY OF HERBERT HOOVER

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, this is the birthday anniversary of a great American, Herbert Hoover, the 31st President of the United States. Today he is 86 years of age. Sometimes, as I contemplate Churchill, Adenauer, Herbert Hoover, and others, I think there is something providential about the fact that they are somehow so richly energized over a long period of years, and that it is during the second mile when men often consummate their greatest work.

In the Book it is written, "If a man compel thee to go with him a mile, go with him twain." We often forget that little word "compel." That is the compulsive mile that is expected of us. The second mile is the voluntary mile.

Of all the people I can think of who have traveled the second, voluntary mile, no one has done a greater job than Herbert Hoover. He met the severe changes of his generation, and probably they were greater than those of any time in two generations. But it was thereafter that he rose to even greater heights, because of the work he did in the relief field, and also in the field of helping to reorganize the Government over which he once presided.

I had occasion to encounter the work done by Herbert Hoover among the children of Europe. I visited a good many schools, and nothing delighted me so much as to hear these children sing and utter their praises in tremulous voices, that here was an efficient man who so thoroughly coordinated and organized the food relief and facilities for distressed and impoverished people, particularly the youngsters of Europe.

That is one of the great things Herbert Hoover did.

Then, of course, he set about the business of organizing the Commission on the Reorganization of the Executive Branch of the Government, with the skill and efficiency he always exhibited, because behind his outstanding excellence were the engineering talents he possesses.

First, to examine the authority which Congress gave him; second, to develop the staff necessary to develop the preliminary plans; then to recruit, from all sections of the country, unpaid voluntary experts to serve on the many task forces in almost every field of governmental endeavor; and then to set them to work. I doubt whether in any time or generation so much voluntary, uncompensated talent from all corners of the country has ever been assembled in the Capital City for the purpose of devoting themselves to the various tasks which have been assigned. Much of it has been engrossed into law. Much of it has been accounted for by Executive order. Much still remains to be done. But here was a great brain; here was a great heart having an abiding interest in the well-being of this country.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I could not pay a tribute so eloquent as the distinguished minority leader has paid to this great American, but I can associate myself with the statement he has just made about this great man, who has a great heart and a great mind; who has served all of America so unselfishly through so many years; and who stands ready at any time, even now, to go wherever he believes he can be of service to this country.

I take pride in calling him my friend. I have had the benefit of his counsel. I have profited from it, as has our country.

I thank the Senator from Illinois for the very eloquent tribute he has paid to this most distinguished American.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I would conclude these observations by thinking about the address which Herbert Hoover made to the Republican Convention in Chicago. It was not a partisan speech. He was showered with enconiums and congratulations from Republicans and Democrats alike. So when he held a press conference yesterday in New York, he said this:

> I made that speech because I hoped to awaken more pride in our country and an enlightened nationalism as a regenerative force from national apathy and moral slump.

Those have been the great guiding forces in the life of Herbert Hoover, now 86 years of age, who sits, with sharpened pencils, trying to complete within his life span what he calls the American epic, which is planned to run to 1,600,000 words. All of it is being done in longhand, by pencil. Then, from those notes, he plans to keep eight secretaries busy, so that he might round out, for other generations, some of the revealing things which happened in his long, constructive, and fruitful lifetime.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the distinguished Senator from Florida.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank the distinguished minority leader for yielding to me.

I should like to add my voice to those of the distinguished minority leader and the distinguished majority leader in speaking words of praise and affection about former President Herbert Hoover.

In 1926, my State of Florida suffered a terrible flood catastrophe which resulted in the drowning of some 300 persons. In 1928, in another similar disaster, 2,200 persons lost their lives. The disasters occurred at different portions of the perimeter of Lake Okeechobee.

President Hoover was exceedingly sympathetic of our plight. He helped in every way within his power to secure early action by the Engineers and the prompt appropriation of funds by Congress—and, of course, we were indebted to Congress, likewise—for the construction of the great levees around certain portions of the lake, which in times of equal danger and emergency since the date of those tragic events have been sufficient to prevent any loss of life.

Last year, the Governor of our State; the members of the State cabinet, who comprise a board handling such problems for our State; and the counties and cities affected, through the governing units joined a great host of our citizens in a petition to the Florida Senators and Members of the House of Representatives, asking that we secure, if possible, early action by Congress to name the levee for that great and distinguished American, former President Hoover.

I am glad to say that although there is a rule, generally honored, which prevents the naming of such structures for persons while they still live, the Committee on Public Works, so ably headed by the distinguished Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ], and its subcommitee, so well handled by the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. KERR], with all members of the full committee concurring, joined in placing that recommendation of ours in the recently passed omnibus public works bill. Thus, by the recent passage of that bill, which has now been approved by the President, those great and merciful works, which so effectively carried out in our own country works of mercy, have been given the name of Herbert Hoover.

We are proud of that fact. We expect to dedicate those levees to his name this fall. We understand that President Hoover will honor us with his presence.

I want to make it clear that on an occasion of this kind the Senate, the Congress, and the people have no political considerations. We all join in paying deserved honor and tribute to a very great humanitarian and a very great American on his birthday. I am glad to add my voice to the words of praise so eloquently uttered by both leaders of the Senate.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I desire to add just a word to the very eloquent remarks of the distinguished minority leader regarding former President Herbert Hoover.

As one who knew him and had the opportunity to talk with him while he was President, and as one who knew him in after years and had the opportunity of having several long discussions with him on matters of government, economics, and social welfare, I have always had the greatest respect and regard for Herbert Hoover.

The speech which he made at the Republican Convention in July, to which the minority leader has referred, was one to which we could all, no matter to which party we belong, pay close attention and from which we could get benefit. It was on the high moral plane, which we all want to attain, and on which we want to build the citizenship of our great country.

I join with the minority leader and other Senators in congratulating former President Hoover on his 86th birthday. I hope he will have many more birthdays to come.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, while Herbert Hoover was born in West Branch, Iowa, I think the land of sunshine, California, has always claimed him. So I yield with great delight to my beloved associate, the distinguished junior Senator from California.

Mr. KUCHEL. I thank the distinguished Senator from Illinois.

The splendid and deserving words of congratulation to a great American, uttered by the distinguished Republican leader of the Senate [Mr DIRKSEN], and echoed with equal eloquence by the distinguished Democratic leader of the Senate, on the birthday of a distinguished American, reflect the high and warm regard of the people of our country for Herbert Clark Hoover.

Iowa born, he grew to manhood in the State from which I come. A graduate of Stanford University, he began early in life to build a reputation as a great engineer and to seek opportunities to be of help to mankind. Surely one of the stirring chapters of his life occurred in the dark days toward and following the end of World War II, when his governmental responsibilities, in a very real sense, were those of administering relief and of directing assistance to the distraught peoples of a war-ravaged continent.

Cabinet officer, successful builder and engineer, distinguished writer and speaker, beloved husband and father, and President of the United States, as Mr. Hoover has continued a great journey in this life he has become, with the passing of the years, more enriched by the high and growing esteem of his fellow Americans—indeed, of mankind.

There remains in his State of California one of his distinguished sons, who himself gave unselfishly to the people of our country during the present administration of President Eisenhower and Vice President NIXON, serving with honor, integrity, and high purpose in the Cabinet. We share with the Hoover family a warmth of respect on this natal anniversary.

I desire to associate myself with the remarks of our two leaders and the remarks of the other Senators who have spoken in wishing for former President Hoover many, many happy and healthful returns of the day.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the distinguished minority whip, the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I desire to join the leadership and my other colleagues in extending felicitations and congratulations to former President Herbert Hoover.

Everyone knows that for a great many years Herbert Hoover was a favorite target of the Democrats. He was blamed for many things for which he was not responsible. He is now looked upon as a revered elder statesman; and we are delighted that he is continuing to make so many fine contributions to the welfare of his country and that he is remaining so active during the declining years of his life.

Mr. President, the history of Herbert Hoover extends from the campus of Stanford University, through the Boxer Rebellion, in China, in the early years of this century, into Manchuria, into other parts of the world, and finally back to this country, where in time he became Secretary of Commerce and, eventually, President of the United States.

In the light of history, I believe he was a great President; and I think future historians will bear out that statement.

We hope his third official farewell visit to the Republican National Convention will be but the beginning of a series of other farewell visits to the Republican National Conventions, and perhaps at some time in the future to the Democratic National Conventions. [Laughter.]

Mr. DIRKSEN. I thank the Senator from Montana.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the distinguished Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, it was my great, good fortune to be privileged to make use of the outstanding talents and wonderful mind of Herbert Hoover in a situation in which he is probably the greatest expert in the world. After my designation as Secretary of Agriculture, it became evident that the food needs of the world were of pressing importance. Mr. Hoover was kind enough to come from New York to Washington to have luncheon with me and to outline to me the probable developments if we tried to establish a food program in the period of emergency following the war. He outlined what the various countries would request and the circumstances and what might be done. I made notes in connection with what he said. I find it most interesting that in the course of the next 3 years, almost everything he predicted at that time did happen in the fashion he outlined.

Subsequently when famines reached great proportions, it became obvious that extreme measures would be necessary. I discussed the matter with Eugene Meyer, the then publisher of the Washington Post. Although Mr. Meyer had had many personal arguments with Mr. Hoover, Mr. Meyer suggested that I request Mr. Hoover's assistance.

At that time Mr. Hoover was engaged in his favorite pastime of fishing; he was fishing along the Atlantic Coast, near Miami. It was impossible to reach him during the day; he could be reached only in the evening, after the boat on which he had been fishing had returned to shore, and after he was at the fishing lodge. I succeeded in reaching him at that time on the telephone. I told him that conditions in the Far East were extremely bad, that I needed his advice and his help, and that I would greatly appreciate it if he would come to Washington briefly. He did so, and discussed the possibility of the formation of an emergency committee of some nature.

I discussed the matter with the then President, Mr. Truman. Although I have read many statements in regard to how Mr. Hoover happened to return to public life, I recall with a great deal of interest his willingness to serve in any sort of capacity.

A meeting with a number of other interested citizens was arranged at the White House, and at that time there was formed the Famine Emergency Committee, of which Mr. Hoover became the chairman. He accepted a small office in the Department of Agriculture. He never requested special treatment as a past President. He served quietly day after day, and helped us enormously in the handling of the food problem.

Subsequently, he decided that in connection with that problem a trip around the world should be made. I asked him to undertake that trip. He did so, and took with him representatives of the Department of Agriculture and of various other groups, and used a plane which was provided by the military services. He flew to almost all parts of the world, and located new and additional food supplies. He made his recommendations not only to the United States, but also to the then existing International Food Board.

I shall never forget the way he made his first recommendations. We were flying to Chicago, for a report which he was to make to the Nation, over the radio. He was seated on one side of the State Department plane. A small table was beside him, and I noticed that he was drawing some pictures. From where I sat, I was unable to determine exactly what the pictures were. But when he had finished, he had drawn three flags. One was the flag of the United States; one was the flag of Great Britain; and one was sort of a neutral flag of the Red Cross. He asked me if I would sit with him, and of course I did so. He pointed to the flags, and said those were the areas of responsibility. He said to me, "Where we have the American flag is your responsibility; you have the responsibility of seeing that food reaches everyone under that flag, and also that food reaches the people in Japan and Austria and Germany where our flag now flies and who must be fed."

Then he pointed to the British flag, and said, "This is the area of British responsibility." He used some interesting terms in referring to the British, because he did not always approve what they did. But he said, "This is what you will have to get the British to do."

Then he said, "In this area over here, you can leave a little to the French, and the rest to the Red Cross. But these are the three flag areas that must be cared for."

I found out then that Herbert Hoover had the most orderly mind I had ever encountered. He had outstanding ability to analyze problems and to arrange for their solution.

I have written to him many times to express my sincere appreciation of his great devotion to duty and his kindness to me; and on this occasion I am happy to pay tribute again to the very fine qualities of this great American.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, let me conclude my salute to this outstanding American, Herbert Hoover, by saying that I think two overriding impulses always carried him on. One was his devotion to mankind.

I recall a couplet from a poem by the Irish novelist, Donn-Byrne:

> Every man's death diminishes me, because I am of mankind.

If ever anyone has exemplified that, it is Herbert Hoover.

The second great imperative was his magnificent, unending, unremitting devotion to liberty and to individual freedom, because he thought that was the priceless boon, God given, the greatest thing that could happen to a man or a nation.

And so when I hear the strains of that march which was written for the Presidency, and when they say, "Hail to the Chief," on this, his 86th birthday, I think the American people can well constructively and symbolically arise as they contemplate this fruitful existence of his and say, "Hail to the Chief."

TABLING OF CIVIL RIGHTS BILL

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, because circumstances beyond my control made it impossible for me to be present yesterday when the vote on the motion to table the civil rights bill introduced by the distinguished minority leader was being considered, I should like to comment briefly on the action taken by the Senate on that occasion.

Mr. President, in the days before mechanization largely displaced draft animals on the farms, there was an old saying that was familiar to many Vermont farmers.

It went like this: "You can't judge a mule by the loudness of its bray." That old saying may be apropos of the action yesterday of most of the members of the present majority party in supporting a motion to table the proferred civil rights bill.

I am not surprised at the position taken by the four Members of the present majority who voted against tabling, since their votes were consistent with long-held positions. However, along with millions of other Americans, I am amazed and shocked beyond belief at the failure of two particular majority party Senators to grab their first opportunity to support civil rights legislation since the TV spectacular at Los Angeles which produced the high-sounding, low-standing, running platform of their party.

While I recognize that many at the Los Angeles convention—and this is particularly true of those who were candidates for office—were largely preoccupied with personal matters, it seems incredible that apparently they have not even read the platform on which they seek to run, let alone stand. Repeatedly, during and since that historic convention, the winning candidates have emphatically and solemnly, and even pugnaciously, embraced their party's platform, in its naked entirety, to their public bosoms and have sworn eternal allegiance and loyalty, if not voluntary love, to each and every one of its separate planks.

Forced love, said the poet, is a frail flower, and he must be right because here, so soon after the touching sentiments, shouted so affirmatively into the microphones and before the cameras, the great lovers have turned their backs on the object of their alleged affections.

Since they may not have had the time to read their own platform, or may have forgotten what they said, I feel I should remind them of their own words: "The time has come," they said, "to assure equal access for all Americans to all areas of community life, including voting booths, schoolrooms, jobs, housing, and public facilities."

"It is the duty of the Congress," they said, "to enact the laws necessary and proper to protect and promote these constitutional rights." That is what they said at Los Angeles in their party platform.

And yesterday, in Washington, they voted to table a civil rights bill.

The idea—or excuse—voiced by some that there is not enough time to pass legislation of this character in approximately 4 weeks is pure and undiluted nonsense.

In the Senate the Democrats have almost a 2 to 1 temporary majority. In the House of Representatives their temporary majority is not quite as large, but it is large enough for them to keep their pledges if they have a sincere desire to do so.

In addition, their party controls the leadership of both Houses and of all the committees and if they cannot make the leadership of the appropriate committees behave, they have the power to discharge those committees and take action on the floors of the respective Houses.

So it is obvious that the argument that there is not enough time is indeed a specious one and is set forth only because there is no desire to implement the platform of their party by passing civil rights legislation.

The indecent haste with which yesterday's civil rights bill was tabled by the majority party makes the insincerity of their noble speeches all too evident. I am informed by the Parliamentarian, who has a long and distinguished record of service in the Senate, that he cannot recall another single instance when a bill was tabled without a second reading. Why, Mr. President, were they in such a hurry that they could not even follow the usual procedure? What were they afraid of?

Every true advocate and lover of civil rights in this country will know the answer and will not fail to realize that there is no hope for meaningful civil rights legislation under the Democrats. Their only true hope lies with the party of Abraham Lincoln.

I may point out that I advised the distinguished majority leader [Mr. JOHNSON of Texas] and the distinguished junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] that I would make some reference to them, by implication at least, during my remarks, and invited them to be present if they wished to be. I did hope they would answer specifically and categorically some of the questions which I think the American people have a right to know relative to civil rights.

STANDING SUBCOMMITTEE TO CONSIDER PROBLEMS OF DISCRIMINATION IN EMPLOYMENT

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, I should like now to go to another subject, but one which is directly related to the question of civil rights.

Mr. President, at the next full committee meeting of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare I shall again offer a motion to establish within the committee a standing subcommittee to consider the problems of discrimination in employment whether due to age, sex, physical handicap, race, color, religion, or national origin.

On February 5, 1959, I made the same motion before the same committee. Unfortunately, the motion was tabled, and in effect rejected, by the vote of the Democratic-controlled majority of the committee.

Incidentally, may I point out that on that occasion not a single Republican member voted to table the motion.

VOTES ON THE RECORD

I serve notice on my colleagues here and now that when I renew my motion to set up an antidiscrimination subcommittee I shall couple with it the request that the executive session vote which took place on February 5, 1959, as well as the vote on the new motion, be made a matter of public record.

I intend to take my motion out of the deep freeze in which it was placed by the Democratic majority because the warmth of the television klieg lights at Los Angeles seems to have thawed their coolness toward human rights. I am pleased that the language of the Democratic platform now confirms my long-held conviction that the subject is of such overriding significance to the welfare of the Nation that this matter should not be allowed to rest in limbo any longer, but should receive immediate consideration.

Despite the fact that Republicans on the Labor and Public Welfare Committee failed last year in their effort to start the ball rolling to end discrimination in employment, there would now appear to be an excellent chance of success, provided the Democratic standard bearer can evidence those qualities of leadership which the public has the right to expect of a presidential candidate.

Discrimination in employment is a single and separate subject and should be dealt with by a single and separate subcommittee which has the specialized task of dealing with all forms of discrimination in employment.

There was such a subcommittee in the 79th, and 81st, and the 83d Congresses. There should be such a subcommittee in the 86th Congress, and the 87th Congress as well, because, unfortunately, the problem is still with us. Six bills dealing with this problem were introduced in the Senate during the last Congress, on which no hearings were held. Several bills related to the same subject have been introduced in this Congress.

The seriousness of the matter should warrant that these, and such other related bills as may be forthcoming, receive careful and comprehensive study and consideration by a subcommittee especially created for this purpose. Part-time and piecemeal consideration by several subcommittees already busily concentrating on other subjects is not good enough.

EVIDENCE OF DISCRIMINATION

Accurate figures on the number of individuals who are victims of discrimination in employment are not easy to come by. Many times the individual himself may not know why he has been denied employment, job training, advancement, or otherwise discriminated against. Some companies, some labor unions, and some employment agencies carry on practices which tend to limit or to deny employment opportunities, or which adversely affect working conditions, including wages and hours, to entire groups when the nature of the job does not require any such distinction.

Nevertheless, there are facts and figures from which reasonable men can draw only one conclusion; unfair and un-American discrimination in employment to whole groups of our citizens.

I shall not take the time to present all the evidence available. I shall only offer enough facts and figures to indicate the extent of these practices and the need for a particular subcommittee to deal with the problem in a unified manner.

DISCRIMINATION AGAINST WOMEN

While some barriers against employment of women in certain jobs have been breaking down, there is plenty of evidence of discrimination against them not only in hiring but also in rate of pay.

Too many of the 21 million women in the labor force are today doing work comparable with that of men and requiring comparable skill, at wage rates lower than those paid to men by the same employer in the same plant or business. The employer is simply exploiting and discriminating against half the population on the basis of sex.

Many women workers are widows or divorcees who need to work to support not only themselves but also minor children. It has been shown that a large majority of women in business and industry are financially responsible for the support of dependents. A former Secretary of Labor has estimated that 92 percent of employed women who live with their families contribute regularly toward family support and that more than one-half of them turn over between 50 and 100 percent of their earnings to the family group.

It is obvious that a woman does not need to earn less simply because she is a woman. Yet discriminatory wage practices on the basis of sex are widespread.

The existence of lower wage rates for women than for men in the same or comparable jobs penalizes those employers who voluntarily apply the equal-pay principle and represents a threat to the wage scale of men as well as of women. During times of economic recession there is always the temptation to cut wages by firing the higher paid workers, or forcing them to accept a lower scale. Over a period of time this tends to lower the levels of earnings of all workers with the result that purchasing power is reduced and standards of living decline.

The economy of our country cannot afford such discriminatory practices. In today's economic competition with the Soviet Union there is no room for sex bias. The Communist countries encourage their women to enter the labor force at all levels by fixing the same standards and wage scales regardless of sex. The result is increasing national productivity.

For two consecutive Congresses the administration has urged the House and Senate to enact legislation providing that women be given equal pay when they perform the same work as men. The Democratic majority of the Congress has taken no action on the President's proposals but they did endorse the substance of them in their election-year platform in Los Angeles.

JOB DISCRIMINATION BASED ON RACE AND COLOR

That discrimination in employment on the basis of race and color is prevalent throughout the country is so obvious it needs no amplification. One has only to look around him. I will give only one Labor Department statistic. Last year twice as large a percentage of the 7 million nonwhite workers as of the 60 million white workers were jobless; 14 percent against 7 percent. That speaks for itself, and it is unnecessary to burden the point to prove it.

That this dicrimination is not due entirely to employer prejudice is the position of a recent NAACP report. This charges that a pattern of racial discrimination exists in many unions in both north and south despite union efforts to ban it. In many communities and industries union membership is important, if not necessary, in obtaining employment. Discrimination by unions is no more palatable than discrimination by management.

I shall not attempt to cite statistics on discrimination in employment against the physically handicapped, or against persons of particular religions and national origins. The very fact that figures are difficult to obtain is evidence that the subject needs objective study and investigation.

THE PRICE OF DISCRIMINATION

Discrimination in employment, for whatever reason, is bad for the country as a whole.

It is contrary to our traditional principles of democracy and private initiative because the individual is denied the opportunity to utilize his full capabilities and is deprived of his right to be judged as an individual rather than as a member of a group.

It weakens our influence abroad because our friends as well as our enemies tend to judge us by our practice as well as our protestations of democracy.

It weakens our economy because it imposes artificial limitations on the size of our manpower pool; it deprives our industry of important resources in skill and experience; it increases the number of our citizens requiring public assistance, and it lowers our standard of living.

In the words of Vice President RICHARD M. NIXON: "The United States cannot afford the moral, economic, and international cost of prejudice in its labor force."

The foregoing are some of the reasons why I believe that discrimination in employment is sufficiently important to the Nation to warrant the establishment of a special standing subcommittee of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator yield to me?

Mr. PROUTY. I am happy to yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. KEATING. I wish to express my commendation to the Senator from Vermont for the suggestion he has made. I feel certain that such a subcommittee would serve a useful purpose, and the initiative which the Senator from Vermont has shown in this matter should be praised, in my judgment, by all of us who are very much interested in the problem of keeping our economic life free from discriminatory practices. I am hopeful the suggestion made by the distinguished Senator from Vermont will bear fruit with the full committee, and that such a subcommittee will be established.

Mr. PROUTY. I am very grateful to the distinguished Senator from New York. I assure him that I—and I am sure this is true of my colleagues on this side of the aisle—shall do my utmost to bring that about. I think it is significant that the platforms adopted by both major parties deal effectively with the question of civil rights. Now it is our responsibility to implement the platforms. I hope the candidates on both sides are going to speak out categorically, so that the American people will know definitely where they stand.

I am sorry the distinguished majority leader is not present. I wanted to ask the majority leader, for example, if, in the event of his reelection to the Senate, and in the event of his reelection as Democratic leader, he would strive to carry out the platform of the Democratic Party—if he would do his utmost to implement the Democratic platform in the next Congress. I am sorry he is not present so he can answer some of these questions. The Democratic platform, I believe, calls for the establishment of a Fair Employment Practices Commission. I should like to have the distinguished majority leader [Mr. JOHNSON of Texas] and the distinguished junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] come out clearly and state their positions on that question, as well as their positions in many other fields.

Mr. KEATING. If the Senator will yield further to me, they stated their positions in their votes yesterday. Will the Senator agree with that statement?

Mr. PROUTY. Certainly their statements should be so construed. As I suggested earlier, I was positively amazed at the action taken by the two distinguished colleagues to whom the Senator refers and many other friends on the other side of the aisle. I was more proud than ever to be a Republican following that vote yesterday on the question of tabling the civil rights bill.

Mr. KEATING. If the Senator will yield further, I know he shares my view that this problem should be as much bipartisan or unpartisan as possible since it deals with human rights. "Human rights" is a phrase that I often prefer to the phrase "civil rights." I wish to join him in his commendation of the four Members of the opposite party who voted in accordance with the convictions which they have on so many occasions evidenced by previous votes here.

Mr. PROUTY. Yes. I paid my tribute to the same Senators during the course of my remarks. I thank the Senator very much. I yield back the remainder of the time.

PUBLIC WORKS APPROPRIATIONS, 1961

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 12326) making appropriations for the civil functions administered by the Department of the Army, certain agencies of the Department of the Interior, the Atomic Energy Commission, the Tennessee Valley Authority, and certain study commissions, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1961, and for other purposes.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I wish to say just a few words about the public works appropriation bill for the next fiscal year which is before the Senate. In my judgment it contains funds sufficient to carry out an orderly program of flood control planning and construction and navigational improvements throughout our country.

I wish particularly to express my gratitude to the distinguished chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee and to the other members of the committee on both sides for the very fine manner in which they received the representations made by the Senators from New York with regard to projects in their State and for the sympathetic consideration and the understanding which they showed for the very great needs in various sections of New York State.

I do feel compelled by conscience, however, to refer again to the inclusion of certain funds in this bill; namely, funds for the oft proposed, oft ignored Allegheny River Reservoir, commonly referred to as the Kinzua Dam. I have no illusion that my protest will effect a reversal in the appropriation of these funds, but, I cannot in good conscience ignore what I know to be a great injustice.

The Allegheny Reservoir is a proposed project for the upper Allegheny River between Warren, Pa., and Salamanca, N.Y., and is designed to provide flood control and low water regulation for industrial and domestic water supply and for pollution abatement for the Allegheny and Ohio River Valleys. It will also make available a lake for summer recreation.

There is no question about the need for a flood control program in the Allegheny River Basin. It is essential. However, the best method of accomplishing this objective has been and continues to be the subject of great controversy and bitter disagreement. In essence, the debate revolves around the question of whether the Kinzua site or the alternative Conewango-Cattaraugus site is the more desirable in terms of flood control protection, water storage capacity with resultant low flow regulation potential and cost. The relative merits of this much debated and little examined subject is hidden in a cloud of controversy which must be cleared away before additional funds for this project are appropriated.

I believe now, as I have in the past, that the best interests of the State of New York, the Seneca Nation of Indians within the State and the Federal Government itself, lies in a complete and impartial examination of the relative merits of each plan. Further work on the project should not be authorized or undertaken until the issue is resolved beyond question.

Dr. Arthur Morgan, former TVA Chairman and former chief engineer of the Pueblo project in Colorado, and of the Miami, Ohio, conservancy project, has constantly maintained that—

First. The Conewango project would protect Pittsburgh, Warren, and other Pennsylvania cities from floods from the upper Conewango Creek as well as the Allegheny River. The Kinzua Dam would not affect the upper Conewango.

Second. The Conewango project would provide three times as much water storage as the Kinzua project.

Third. The Conewango project would be cheaper than the Kinzua project.

Fourth. The Conewango project would be simpler to construct and would take 2 years less to complete than the Kinzua project.

Fifth. The Conewango project would amply protect against two and a half to three times as much floodwater as the Kinzua, while the Kinzua project would protect Pennsylvania cities against only half the maximum probable flood.

Sixth. The Conewango project would create a permanent lake 28 square miles in area with a variation in water level of 10 to 20 feet from high water to low water. The Kinzua project would create a lake 4 square miles in area with a fluctuation in water level of 80 to 100 feet.

Dr. Morgan has submitted several detailed and most persuasive statements in explanation and support of the above contentions.

As recently as April of this year, I again contacted Maj. Gen. E. C. Itschner, Chief of Engineers, by joining in a letter with my senior colleague, Senator JACOB K. JAVITS, and Representative CHARLES E. GOODELL, which requested answers to a number of pointed and indeed very provocative questions which Dr. Morgan had raised in connection with the Kinzua site. Questions ranged from the relative flood protection which might be expected from each site; the water storage capacities of each with resultant low flow regulation potential; the cost of both projects including such factors as the quantity and quality of land to be inundated by the dam; the replacement of existing roadways; the relocation of railroad beds, and so forth.

The answers which the Corps of Engineers supplied, though elaborate and verbose, were not entirely responsive and did not satisfactorily answer our queries. In fact, they raised further questions in my own mind and heightened the disagreements which existed between Dr. Morgan and themselves.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks, the questions raised in my letter to the Corps of Engineers dated April 6, 1960, together with General Itschner's answers thereto contained in his reply of May 10, 1960, and detailed comments on General Itschner's response by Dr. Morgan. An examination of this correspondence evidences the sharp differences of opinion between Dr. Morgan and the corps and point up the need for an objective study of the situation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. KEATING. Until such time as a complete and impartial examination of the relative merits of these sites has been made, taking into consideration the multitudinous factors which must be analyzed, I must object most strenuously to appropriating additional funds for a project which might prove to be a white elephant of the worst sort. As I stated previously, I am not unsympathetic to or ignorant of the flood control situation in Pennsylvania; nor do I claim that Dr. Morgan's Conewango-Cattaraugus alternative site is necessarily the answer to their problem. It is simply my feeling that a project of the scope and magnitude of the Kinzua Dam costing over $100 million should not be undertaken until all factors and possible alternatives have been thoroughly examined.

Of equal, if not greater, importance is the fact that the Kinzua site would inundate the heartland of the Seneca Nation—property which was the subject of a treaty signed in 1794 by George Washington with the Seneca Nation. Under that treaty the United States agreed never to claim the same, nor disturb the Seneca Nation in the free use thereof. Should we now dishonor this treaty without clear and unequivocal proof that this is the only way to end the floods along the Allegheny River? I think not.

The Seneca Indians have repeatedly stated that if the Kinzua Dam were the only reasonable solution to the flood control problem along the Allegheny River—they would withdraw their objections to its construction and suffer the loss of their community with a realistic resignation to the more compelling needs of others. The rational propriety of this position should be evident to all. However, it would appear that even this limited appeal is to be disregarded.

I do not feel that alternate plans have been adequately considered or studied, and I share the Senecas sincere belief that alternative measures are plausible.

Until this conviction is factually refuted we should not break our solemn obligation to the Seneca Nation. The particular project may be local, but the principle involved is a moral one of national scope.

EXHIBIT 1

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS RAISED IN LETTER OF APRIL 6, 1960, FROM SENATORS JACOB K. JAVITS AND KENNETH B. KEATING AND CONGRESSMAN CHARLES E. GOODELL TO LT. GEN. E. C. ITSCHNER, CHIEF OF ENGINEERS, U.S. ARMY

Question 1. I. Dr. Morgan contends that the Kinzua Dam would provide full protection for substantially less than one-half of the flood which will result from the maximum spring rainfall in the upper Allegheny River watershed, as determined by the U.S. Weather Bureau, in contrast to the Conewango-Cattaraugus alternative plan, which would fully protect Pittsburgh against three times as great a flood. With respect to this contention, we have the following questions:

(1) Is it true that Kinzua Dam will protect against precipitation less than one-half as great as the probable maximum rainfall, and that the storage capacity of the project cannot be increased without flooding a portion of Salamanca, N.Y.?

Answer. The Corps of Enginers, in cooperation with the U.S. Weather Bureau, since 1938 has carried on an extensive storm-study program under which more than 800 storms have been analyzed. Hydrometeorological experts of the Weather Bureau have studied each of these storms in detail to determine the adjustments necessary to represent the maximum rainfall potential in different areas of the country. The spillway design storm (probable maximum precipitation) has been selected from these studies. It represents the most severe storm condition that could conceivably develop over the Allegheny River Basin.

The most severe storm rainfall is assumed for design of the height of dam and size of spillway to assure protection against failure of the dam under any possible flood condition. It does not follow that a reservoir should be designed to provide complete control of a flood of this magnitude. Such a degree of control is considered as beyond reasonable approach, except in very unusual circumstances. Through experience gained over many years, the Corps of Engineers has developed what it terms as the "standard project flood" as the reasonable maximum goal toward flood control development. While such a flood would be substantially less in magnitude than the spillway design flood, in this instance it still would be one of rare probability and it would exceed any floods that have occurred in the area. The "standard project flood" for the Allegheny Basin has been adopted as the design flood for determination of flood storage requirements. It would have a natural peak discharge at the dam site of 116,000 cubic feet per second, compared with the maximum discharge of 60,500 cubic feet per second during the flood of record which occurred in March 1956.

The Allegheny Reservoir, had it been in operation, would have completely controlled all floods of record in the upper Allegheny River Basin. The maximum storage would have been required for regulation of the March 1936 flood. The total flood control storage available at the beginning of that flood would have been 867,000 acre-feet. The flood would have filled 644,000 acre-feet, leaving an unused capacity of 223,000 acre-feet.

Storage allocations in the Allegheny Reservoir are as follows:

	Winter and spring, Nov. 1–Feb. 15		Summer and fall, May 1–June 20
	Thousand acre-feet	Elevation	Thousand acre-feet	Elevation
Dead storage	24	1,240	24	1,240
Storage for low-flow regulation	216	1,292	549	1,328
Flood control storage	940	1,365	607	1,365
Total	1,180		1,180

The total storage capacity of Allegheny Reservoir could not be increased without affecting portions of Salamanca. However, as pointed out herein, the reservoir design flood which this reservoir is designed to control is a reasonable maximum goal for purposes of flood control operation of the project.

It is recognized that the project will not control the spillway design flood, nor is it an objective of the project to do so. If the spillway design flood occurred with the flood control pool approximately half full, the maximum reservoir release would be about 137,000 cubic feet per second. If this flood occurred with the flood control pool empty, however, the estimated maximum flood control release would be reduced to about 77,000 cubic feet per second, or to less than 30 percent of the peak reservoir inflow. Releases for lesser floods, ranging between the spillway design flood and the reservoir design flood, would be correspondingly less, down to the minimum release of 3,000 cubic feet per second for the reservoir design flood.

Proposals for diverting floodwaters into Lake Erie, or for providing more storage in a reservoir in the Conewango Valley, would not be controlling in obtaining a large factor of safety from floods at Pittsburgh. The channel capacity at Pittsburgh at nondamaging stage is equal to about 210,000 cubic feet per second, and a higher discharge could be passed without major damage. The relatively high degree of control provided by other reservoirs above Pittsburgh greatly reduces the chance of local flood peaks coinciding with peak spillway releases from the Allegheny Reservoir. In view of the extremely low probability of occurrence of the spillway design flood, the average annual damages attributable to such an occurrence of the spillway design flood, the average annual damages attributable to such an occurrence would be very low.

Comment on question 1 by Dr. Arthur E. Morgan: "The corps' answers to this question does not deny that Kinzua will protect against less than one-half of the maximum probable precipitation. Even if 'maximum probable precipitation' were more than must be protected against, 40 percent of that, which is what the corps' 'analysis' and the Tippetts reports show (see corps analysis of April 1959, p. 2, par. 3) is much too little.

"The expression, 'It represents the most severe storm conditions that could conceivably develop over the Allegheny River Basin,' is ill advised. The corps has a letter from the Weather Bureau advising against such an expression, and advising use of the term 'probable maximum precipitation,' which is very different. U.S. Weather Bureau Report No. 33 discusses the reason for using the term 'maximum probable precipitation,' not 'maximum possible precipitation.' The Weather Bureau itself, after the great storm of 5 years ago, stopped using that expression, and wrote the Engineer Corps, September 28, 1956, that it was revising its estimates upward. This change occurred several years after the supposedly conclusive study mentioned in the answer to question 1, when actual rainfall changed their minds. The fact is that our history is too short for us to have probably experienced a maximum flood. The expression that the reservoir flood 'would exceed any floods that have occurred in this area' should be modified by adding 'during the relatively short period of record.'

"The Weather Bureau has made it explicitly clear that while it has estimated rainfall, it has not estimated how great a flood could result from that rainfall. Its wording on this point is: 'It is not within the scope of this study to make determination of infiltration rates or runoff coefficients.' The size of the flood would depend on the amount of snow on the ground, how wet the ground was at the time of the rainfall, whether or not the ground was frozen, the proportion of the rain running off, etc. The Engineer Corps has overlooked or greatly minimized such possibilities as snow on the ground, the possibility of frozen ground from which practically all water would run off, and particularly the fallibility of flood forecasting.

"As has clearly been pointed out by the Pennsylvania Department of Forests and Waters in cooperation with the U.S. Geological Survey, in their report on floods of March 1936 in Pennsylvania, the flood forecasting which may be fairly dependable for moderately large floods, such as 1936, may fail greatly in case of a very great storm. There are various risks and uncertainties which are beyond calculation. Good engineering, if possible, provides excess capacity as margins of safety for such uncertainties. The capacity of Kinzua is absolutely limited, and cannot be given a margin of safety. Therefore, we say that taking reasonable factors of safety into account, Kinzua has barely a third the capacity needed for the maximum probable flood, to say nothing of 'the most severe storm that could conceivably develop over the Allegheny River Basin.' It should have somewhere about double its capacity to be even reasonably secure against very large floods.

"As to the hydrometrical studies referred to, they were made years after the site of Kinzua was selected. No increase in Kinzua could be made as a result of those studies, for the reason that the corps was already planning to use all the capacity Kinzua was capable of; and regardless of what the studies might show, they could not increase that capacity. The studies showed the need for greater capacity, but the reasoning of the corps had to come around to the capacity they had, not what they needed.

"Concerning the last paragraph on page 1, which says, 'Such a degree of control is considered beyond reasonable approach, except in very unusual circumstances.' We do have unusual circumstances here. Such remarkably favorable circumstances for getting rid of all excess floodwater, no matter how great the flood, probably do not occur once in several hundred times. Why lose them when they do occur? Especially is this true when a great city like Pittsburgh can be protected from the greatest possible flood at no greater cost.

" 'Through experience gained over many years' (incidentally, Morgan has been building flood-control reservoirs twice as long as has the corps. When he was planning the Miami River dams the Army engineer in charge of the Ohio River Division issued a special publication condemning flood control reservoirs in general and the Miami system in particular) the corps has arrived at a rule-of-thumb standard that a 'standard project flood' shall be half as large as the maximum probable flood. The Tippetts firm made that rule clear in their report. Is it not miraculous that one-half, the simplest of all fractions, should be just what is necessary? Or is it very rough-and-ready rule of thumb? And should the rule be the same where the safety of a great city is at stake as in ordinary circumstances, as on the Cumberland, where the risk to life and property is very small in comparison? In this case, because of the rigidly limited capacity of Kinzua, the one-half of the probable maximum could not be reached, even with inadequate consideration of such risks as snow on the ground, frozen soil, and so forth.

"[From p. 2]: 'The Allegheny Reservoir, had it been in operation would have completely controlled all floods of record in the upper Allegheny Basin.' The history of our country is so short that such statements mean little as to flood possibilities. The Miami River at Dayton, Ohio, has almost the same drainage area as the Allegheny above Kinzua (2,550 square miles above Dayton as against 2,180 above Kinzua). Aside from the 1913 flood, the greatest flood in 150 years had been about 90,000 cubic feet per second. The 1913 flood had a discharge of 250,000 cubic feet per second, from relatively flat Ohio farmland. That was about 98 second-feet per square mile as against about 50 second-feet per square mile for the 'standard project flood' for Kinzua. And the Dayton flood is not considered the maximum. The cities below are protected against a flood 40 percent greater than that of 1913, much greater than the spillway flood estimated by the corps. The corps estimates that 67 percent of the rain would run off the steep mountainsides. In the case of the Dayton flood, 91 percent ran off from the relatively flat farmland, even with no snow on the ground to add to the flood, and with the ground not frozen.

"The corps starts with the greatly inadequate capacity of Kinzua, and must make the figures come out so that it will seem large enough. Why not take advantage of the 'very unusual circumstances' which seldom occur, but do occur here? An engineer who overlooks unusual circumstances when they do occur has failed as an engineer.

"The next to the last paragraph under question No. 1 simply states that the smaller the flood and the more favorable the circumstances, the less damage would result.

"The first sentence on page 3 (question 1) is a flat, obvious misstatement. The rest of the paragraph is wishful thinking. The assumptions about the sequence and length of very unusual storms are largely sheer guesswork. Very great storms are unusual in more ways than sheer size. Also, as is customary, this paragraph discusses the maximum or spillway flood as though there were nothing between that and the standard design flood. If a rain half as great as the probable maximum should fall on heavy snow, which is entirely possible as stated in the report by the U.S. Geological Survey and the Pennsylvania Department of Forests and Waters, referred to above, a flood could occur about as great as the estimated spillway flood.

"The contention in this last paragraph under question 1, that 'Proposals for diverting floodwaters into Lake Erie, or for providing more storage in a reservoir in the Conewango Valley, would not be controlling in obtaining a large factor of safety from floods at Pittsburgh,' is not sound. With all proposed reservoirs above Pittsburgh constructed, half the watershed above Pittsburgh still would be uncontrolled, and a major flood could, and probably will, occur. Full protection from the upper Allegheny, such as would be provided by Conewango-Cattaraugus and not by Kinzua, would add a substantial element of additional safety."

Question 2. (2) In calculating the size of the flood against which Kinzua Dam is designed to protect, what consideration was given to the possibility of a lesser storm before major rainfall; what percentage of the latter precipitation was estimated as runoff; and what allowance was made for snow on the ground? Is the Corps of Engineers aware of the Weather Bureau prediction that a typical major storm would be preceded by a smaller storm within such a short period that the flood storage portion of the reservoir could not be wholly emptied? Is there experience to show that a runoff of as much as 90 percent is possible, even without snow in areas comparable to the Allegheny Valley?

Answer. The Corps of Engineers is aware of the Weather Bureau's determination that a typical major storm could be preceded by a smaller storm within a period of a few days. Such a condition was assumed in routing the maximum probable storm rainfall through the reservoir to determine the required spillway capacity for the dam. The assumption of such an antecedent storm is a factor of safety which is considered justified when dealing with the spillway design flood, for the purpose of assuring the safety of the structure, but not necessarily in the case of the reservoir design flood. A factor of safety is inherent in the manner in which the reservoir design flood was routed through the reservoir, since the reservoir pool elevation at the beginning of the flood was assumed to be at the upper limit of the summer pool. The flood control capacity of the Allegheny Reservoir would be adequate to control all floods of record in the Allegheny River Basin, several of which had more than one peak.

The runoff to be expected from the reservoir design flood was not determined by taking an arbitrary percentage of the rainfall but was established by computing the rate of absorption or infiltration into the soil, based on studies of past major storms of the same general type. The reservoir design flood would be one of the heavy summer-fall variety. The greatest storm of this type that has occurred in the vicinity of the upper Allegheny Basin and the eastern United States was that of July 1942. This storm occurred over western New York and Pennsylvania. Although the intensity of this storm has been exceeded at some time on the U.S. mainland, it is certain that its maximum 12-hour and 24-hour intensities are the highest for these durations that have been measured within the continental limits of the United States, with the possible exception of the immediate gulf coast, even though the locale of the storm is not in a portion of the country most susceptible to greatest rainfall. The storm area embraced portions of the upper Allegheny, Susquehanna, and Genessee River Basins, and resulted in rainfall averaging 7.3 inches over an area of about 4,000 square miles. Within this area, rainfall far greater than the average occurred in many places. The rainfall losses to percolation, transpiration, and evaporation during the July 1942 storm, were as much as 5 inches. In comparison, the losses assumed for the reservoir design flood were 3.7 inches. While a runoff-rainfall ratio as high as 90 percent could occur during storms of other types, it would not be applicable to the severe late summer or fall storm that has been adopted for the reservoir design flood. Snow on the ground as an additional source of runoff obviously would not be compatible with the occurrence of the reservoir design flood. A maximum winter-type storm with snowmelt would not result in as critical flood storage conditions as would the summer-fall type storm.

Comment on question 2 by Dr. Arthur E. Morgan: "The answer to this question is a devious recognition of the fact that the reservoir flood against which Kinzua is supposed to protect, is not half the maximum flood, but only half the second peak of that flood. The multitude of words does not cover up that admission.

"Here again there is reference to the fact that Kinzua would control all floods of record. As in the case of the Dayton flood and of some others, a flood may occur two or three times as great as any that has occurred for a century; and that occurrence may be next year, or many years from now. Pittsburgh can have complete protection against the very greatest possible flood, and at no more cost. Is it not assuming a heavy responsibility to take less?

"Note first sentence of page 4. The Weather Bureau studies show that any one of four major types of storm can occur over the upper Allegheny.

"The latter part of the first paragraph on page 4 makes a clear admission of what we had suspected, but were not sure of. The answer speaks of 'the severe late summer or fall storm that has been adopted for the "reservoir design flood".' The answer mentions winter type storms and summer type storms. It is neither of these which causes the great floods, but the storms of March and April. Three quarters of the floods, including the largest, occur in those 2 months. March or April rains may fall on heavy snow, and March floods on frozen ground. Snow may add 50 percent as much water as a very heavy rain, and the water-soaked ground may also greatly increase runoff. Storm rainfall in March probably cannot be quite as extreme as that of August, but snow and wet ground make a far greater difference. The summer type of storm used for Kinzua would result in a far smaller flood than a March or early April storm.

"The choice of a late summer or fall storm largely discredits the estimates of possible floods. I repeat, most of the large floods in that area occur in March or April, not in either summer or winter, which are the seasons referred to in the answer. A 'reservoir flood' with snow on the ground and a much larger portion of the rain running off than in summer, could have approximately twice the runoff of a summer storm of a relative size for its type."

Question 3. Do the plans for operation of Kinzua Dam call for the discharge of temporary impounded water into the Allegheny River during the flood season in order to prepare for storing the water of the next storm? If so, what is the possibility that, through human error in weather forecasting, the released water will contribute to downstream flooding at or below Pittsburgh?

Answer. The storage allocated for flood control in the Allegheny Reservoir is the amount determined to be required to regulate the standard project flood to a uniform outflow rate equal to the bank-full channel capacity of 25,000 cubic feet per second beginning on the fourth day. The 4-day lag is provided to insure that all possibility of flooding at Warren, Pa., has passed. This analysis is based on the most severe flood control requirements that could be imposed on the reservoir during the occurrence of such a flood. Under normal operations, not more than about 3,000 cubic feet per second would be released from the reservoir during a flood. Storage would be continued until the upper Allegheny had crested, the lower Allegheny was nearing its crest, and the Ohio River at Pittsburgh was expected to crest and recede below 21 feet within 18 hours. Consideration of time and distance factors in relation to storm patterns involving a widespread area of the United States leaves little likelihood that releases from the Allegheny Reservoir would contribute to flood peaks farther downstream on the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers.

Comment on question 3 by Dr. Arthur E. Morgan: "The answer given to this question, if intelligently and critically examined, shows either crude ignorance or intent to mislead.

"After large floods it would take 2 to 4 weeks to empty the flood-control portion of the Kinzua Reservoir. This would mean that for 2 to 4 weeks during a flood season which lasts for 3 months there would be an additional 25,000 cubic feet per second of water in the river all the way from Kinzua to the gulf, to add to any flood crest it might meet along the way. Great floods tend to be general floods in seasons of floods. According to statements and records of the Corps of Engineers, expenditures of up to $100 to $200 million are in prospect to accomplish no more than would be accomplished by the diversion of upper Allegheny floodwater to Lake Erie.

"Such expressions as 'is expected to crest' and 'there is little likelihood' represent guesses as to how storms will behave. Members of the Corps of Engineers in the past have pointed out the disadvantages of this type of control, and have stated that in some circumstances such release of water might actually raise flood crests at Pittsburgh. The corps has an imaginary picture as to how storm rainfall will proceed. Especially in great floods, storm rainfall does not proceed according to expectation.

"Conewango, by diverting all floodflow to Lake Erie, would entirely eliminate this disadvantage of Kinzua. For that one superiority alone, Conewango would be worth more than its full cost. Both projects are not needed.

"An interjection: Lake Erie is so large that if a total spillway or maximum flood should be discharged into it, with no storage in Conewango, the lake would be raised about as much as though a mild half-inch rain had fallen on its surface."

Question 4. (4) Assuming that protection against the maximum probable flood is not practical in all situations, shouldn't the corps' objective be to obtain the maximum protection feasible? Is the Conewango-Cattaraugus alernative plan both feasible and capable of controlling at least three-fourths of the maximum probable flood? If so, what value was assigned to this feature of the plan in calculating cost-benefit ratios in comparison to the Kinzua project?

Answer. It is the objective of the Corps of Engineers to provide the maximum degree of flood protection that can be economically justified. In view of the extremely low probability of occurrence of a flood of the magnitude of the spillway design flood, the average annual damages attributable to such an occurrence would be very low and would not justify the additional cost of providing the added protection.

In its consideration of alternative plans, the Corps of Engineers engaged the engineering firm of Tippetts-Abbett-McCarthy-Stratton to develop engineering alternatives in comparison with the authorized Allegheny Reservoir. The engineering firm studied five plans which covered the principal possibilities for storage in the Conewango Basin and for diversion into Lake Erie. One of the plans studied (plan 5) included a reservoir on Conewango Creek which would be large enough to store the spillway design flood. According to the estimates of the engineering firm, that plan would cost 38 percent more than the authorized project, would require the taking of 108 percent more land, and would require the dislocation of 180 percent more people. It was concluded that the added cost involved in providing a reservoir capable of storing the spillway design flood could not be justified on the basis of the small amount of annual benefits that would result therefrom.

The plan proposed by Dr. Morgan in his October 1958 report would not control a flood three-fourths of the maximum probable flood. In fact, table 1 of that report shows Dr. Morgan's reservoir design flood to be approximately equal in volume to that for the Allegheny Reservoir. Control of even this flood would require releases into Cattaraugus Creek much in excess of its capacity and probably at a time when high flow conditions exist in the stream from runoff generated by its natural drainage area. Since the reservoir design flood provided for in Dr. Morgan's plan is not greater than that for Allegheny Reservoir, no additional flood control benefits can be realized. Also, flood damages in Cattaraugus Creek must be recognized.

Comment on question 4 by Dr. Arthur E. Morgan: "Here the corps mentions the rare possibility of a spillway flood. The fact that in March or April a flood half as great could do about as much damage is ignored. By holding attention to the flood following a maximum rainfall—which would be in summer with no snow and low runoff—the corps avoids attention to all the stages of floods in between, and of greater frequency, when very great damage could result from much smaller rainfalls.

"The answer states that the Tippetts firm employed by the corps 'studied five alternative plans which covered the principal possibilities for storage in the Conewango Basin and for diversion into Lake Erie.' This statement is false. This firm made no study whatever of two such possibilities, either of which would be far superior to anything they did study. When they were beginning their work I wrote them:

" 'The earlier fieldwork and calculations for this study were largely made by my long-time friend and associate, Barton M. Jones. On his sudden death a few weeks ago I located such of his papers as I could and have continued the study. He commented frequently that the project has such a variety of promising alternatives that when the possibilities and economies are fully worked out the plans may have little resemblance to the ones he has prepared. * * * It is hoped that as Tippetts-Abbott-McCarthy-Stratton make their study with more adequate resources they will not simply determine the feasibility of the elements we propose, but will be alert to see further possibilities and economies, as well as any weak spots in our proposals.'

"The firm made no such study, and only looked into suggestions I was able to make at the time they began. When I found they would not make such a search and had no time to consider any further suggestions, I continued the search, and turned up Conewango-Cattaraugus. That plan would be far superior to any they studied, and would avoid most of the disadvantages they pointed out, and would cost $20 million less than the least expensive plan they studied. The assertion in this answer that Conewango-Cattaraugus would probably cost no less than the three modifications of one diversion plan studied by Tippetts is sheer, irresponsible and inaccurate presumption which should be beneath the self-respect of a great public agency. Such irresponsible assertions have greatly clouded and confused this issue.

"The Tippetts report makes it clear that any of the three modifications of the diversion plan they studied would fully and completely control, not only the reservoir flood by the maximum or spillway flood, by diverting the excess to Lake Erie. The Tippetts report is explicit on that, and until the answer to this question, the corps has never questioned it. The corps assertion to the contrary controverts the definite and explicit finding of its consultants.

"The further answer to the question is totally and obviously irresponsible, and could scarcely be made in good faith. The statement reads: 'One of the plans studied (plan 5) included a reservoir on Conewango Creek which would be large enough to store the spillway design flood,' implying that the other plans would not control such a flood. This, in fact, was a study to show what would be possible with the Conewango Reservoir without diversion, and without turning water down the Allegheny during the flood period. The study showed that Conewango Reservoir would hold the total spillway design flood on top of the total reservoir design flood with no discharge in any direction. Of course, the value of diversion would be in making great flood storage unnecessary.

"A discussion of cost, land taken and people dislocated by such a very large reservoir has no bearing on the situation, as the study showed that method to be far inferior to the others studied. To bring that study into the picture indicates willingness to cloud the issue. That statement confuses storage of the spillway flood and controlling it by diversion.

"The further statement, 'The plan proposed by Dr. Morgan in his 1958 report would not control a flood three-fourths of the maximum possible flood,' is explicitly inaccurate. It would protect the Allegheny River and Pittsburgh against the full spillway or maximum flood, just as would any of the diversion plan studies made by Tippetts. The Tippetts report states explicitly that in case of the spillway design flood no flood water would pass down the Allegheny River. That would have the advantage of fully and completely protecting Pittsburgh and Warren from up to three times the flood which Kinzua would fully protect against, and of entirely removing all upper Allegheny floodflow from the Allegheny, Ohio and Mississippi Rivers under all conditions. The Tippetts report clearly draws attention to that enormous advantage in the body of the report, but not in the summary. That advantage, which Kinzua lacks, would be worth not less than $100 million in saving other flood control reservoir construction. The Conewango-Cattaraugus plan has all the advantages of any of the Tippetts diversion plans, and very great advantages and economies in addition.

"As to damages from discharging into the Cattaraugus Channel, the cost of protection against damage is included in the estimated cost. Where Conewango would discharge into Cattaraugus the latter is a rock gorge 300 feet deep, with sheer rock walls 100 feet or more high. For most of the distance from Gowanda to Lake Erie there is a 300-foot rock slope on one side and a valley on the other. Here a levee would be needed on one or both sides. The cost of that is included in the estimate. That levee would protect the valley land from flooding which is now experienced, and is greatly desired by landowners in the valley. Of course, a large flow down the Cattaraugus would be very infrequent."

Question 5. II. Dr. Morgan contends that the Conewango Reservoir site possesses a far larger storage capacity than the Kinzua Dam and, accordingly, could provide a greater flow of water from winter storage for improvement of public and industrial water supplies and other downstream benefits during the dry summer months. This contention, we understand, is conceded by the Corps of Engineers. A 1957 report of the U.S. Public Health Service concerning low-flow regulation on the Allegheny River shows that additional water in the stream will result in proportionately greater benefits.

Assuming a continued growth in population and industrial activity along the Allegheny River, will not the greater capacity of the Conewango Reservoir site constitute an asset of ever-increasing value?

Answer: Allegheny Reservoir would impound 549,000 acre-feet of water for augmentation of low flows, of which 333,000 acre-feet would be seasonal storage. Water would be released during periods of low flow on the lower Allegheny River to dilute industrial and domestic wastes, thereby improving the quality of water in the Pittsburgh area.

The summer low-flow regulation storage requirements were determined from a reservoir operation study covering a 27-year period beginning in May 1929. Also, critical low-water periods outside the 27-year period were investigated. Those studies showed that 521,000 acre-feet should be provided for low-flow augmentation at Natrona, Pa. (24 miles above Pittsburgh), during the worst drought period of 1930–31, and that storage in excess of 450,000 acre-feet would be utilized in 9 out of 12 years in a period comparable with that from 1929 through 1940.

Flow regulation benefits for Allegheny Reservoir, as established by the Public Health Service, are based on (1) improving the quality of water by reducing temperature, corrosiveness, hardness, and manganese content, and (2) estimated reductions in the cost of waste treatment beyond the cost of direct treatment which would be required to provide desirable stream quality standards without any low-flow regulations. Annual benefits attributable to these operations have been estimated as follows:

Public water supplies:
Manganese reduction	$37,000
Hardness reduction	176,000
Acidity reduction	8,000
Total	221,000
Industrial water supply:
Hardness reduction	77,000
Temperature reduction	98,000
Total	175,000
Navigation: Acid corrosion reduction	20,000
Organic pollution abatement	730,000
Total	1,146,000

The benefits from low-flow regulation would not increase proportionately to an increase in storage capacity. For example, pollution abatement benefits credited to the authorized Allegheny Reservoir are based on estimated reductions in the cost of waste treatment, beyond the cost of direct treatment that would be needed in any event, to provide desirable stream quality standards without any low-flow regulation. Such pollution abatement benefits are limited to the cost of treatment facilities that can be eliminated and would not be increased by additional flows from a larger storage reservoir. The additional flow that would be provided from a larger reservoir would have some additional value in improving the quality of water under existing conditions of water use (estimated by the corps to be about $130,000 annually, which capitalized at 5 percent would support an added cost of $2,600,000). In addition, it is not practicable under present authorities to assess benefits for conjectural possible future water supply needs as a basis for justifying additional water supply storage. Such additional storage for flow regulation would be provided, when needed, in some instances more economically by regulation of storage on other Ohio River tributaries. According to an estimate by Tippetts, Abbett, McCarthy, Stratton, a reservoir in the Conewango Basin having almost twice the storage for flow regulation provided in Allegheny Reservoir would cost over $40 million more.

The storage provided in any reservoir is recognized as an asset of ever-increasing value. However, the additional investment that would be required cannot be justified on the basis of the benefits that can now be evaluated. It should be noted that Dr. Morgan's proposed plan provided a storage reservation for flow regulation of 520,000 acre-feet, as compared with 549,000 acre-feet of storage for this purpose in the authorized Allegheny Reservoir. Obviously, this would produce a slightly smaller benefit than the authorized project.

Comment on question 5 by Dr. Arthur E. Morgan: "The answer here is substantially that 'the benefits from low-flow regulation do not increase proportionately to an increase in storage capacity.' This is exactly opposite to the finding of the study by the U.S. Public Health Service included in the official Kinzua report. The table quoted in the answer is abstracted from a larger table which shows the opposite. That larger table is attached hereto. The extrapolations on the right side of the vertical line are sound.

"The most controversial item in this table is $730,000 for saving construction of additional sewage treatment facilities. The fact is that completed construction was made without reference to Kinzua, and there are no further definite plans and no official demand or commitment for further construction which Kinzua would obviate, and it may never be needed. This information is received directly from official sources. (The department of health at Harrisburg and the Ohio River Sanitary Commission.) Therefore the $730,000 annual benefit is not justified.

"As to benefits from storage for low water increase, as with all public improvement, future growth is anticipated. Seldom is a bridge or a dam or a navigation improvement built just for existing use. Growth is anticipated and prepared for. General Itschner, Chief of Engineers, stated in a public address last October:

" 'It has been estimated that by 1980 the use of water in this valley (less Cumberland and Tennessee) will be about 3.5 times the present use. Allowing for the reuse of water, the total demand in 1980 is expected to be some 13 times greater than the present dependable discharge of the lower Ohio River. * * *

" 'Opportunities now at hand to provide against the occurrence of water shortages by this method (multiple-purpose reservoirs) are slipping away from us for want of adequate recognition of the problem.'

"The Corps of Engineers answer (last paragraph) includes the statement: 'It should be noted that Dr. Morgan's proposed plan provided a storage reservoir for low flow regulation of 520,000 acre-feet, as compared with 549,000 acre-feet of storage for this purpose in the authorized Allegheny Reservoir. Obviously this would produce a slightly smaller benefit than the authorized project.' As the engineers of the corps would know if they studied the Tippetts report, this is not my plan in detail, but the Tippetts plan, made after my general suggestions. However, the comment is misleading. The authorized plan has a minimum pool capacity of 20,000 acre-feet. For the alternative plan the Tippetts engineers saw fit to provide a minimum pool capacity of 180,000 acre-feet. By assigning 30,000 acre-feet of this Conewango minimum pool for low water control, the low water storage would be the same for both, leaving 150,000 acre-feet of minimum lake for Conewango-Cattaraugus as against 20,000 acre-feet of minimum lake for Kinzua."

Question 6. III. Dr. Morgan contends that the Kinzua Dam will flood, and thus destroy, a valuable existing recreation area, including hundreds of cottages and part of the Allegheny National Forest, while the Conewango–Cattaraugus alternatives plan will create a new recreation area out of lands now largely unusable: (1) Will the water impounded by Kinzua Dam flood an existing recreational area? Will the level of the Kinzua pool fluctuate each year about 60 feet? If so, will this fluctuation in the shoreline cause the northern end of the lake to recede approximately 10 miles downstream between high and low water, thus leaving mud flats or similar unsightly and unusable land in much of the affected area in New York?

Answer. The land acreage lying below the reservoir-full elevation of Allegheny Reservoir may be classified as follows:

	Pennsylvania	New York	Total
Cornplanter Reservation	644	----------	644
Allegheny National Forest	1,604	----------	1,604
Private lands	6,807	1,317	8,124
Allegany Reservation	----------	9,077	9,077
Allegany State Park	----------	84	84
Total	9,055	10,478	19,533

There are no known recreation developments on the Cornplanter and Allegany Reservations. The portion of Allegany State Park within the reservoir is undeveloped woodland. The Allegheny National Forest has a development in the Kinzua Creek area known as Camp Cornplanter, which will be somewhat affected by the reservoir. This development consists of good camp facilities leased by the Warren County Association for Retarded Children. The principal facilities lie above the reservoir, but certain adjustments will be required, such as the access road and electric power service line which dip into the reservoir. The Forest Service also maintains nine wooden picnic tables within the reservoir. The only other known recreation facility within the reservoir is a privately owned nine-hole golf course in the village of Kinzua.

As is evident from the above table most of the affected land in Pennsylvania is in private ownership. As is true of most of the Allegheny River Valley and tributary valleys above the Pittsburgh industrial area, the streams are attractive to fisherman, and hunting is popular in the Allegheny National Forest and the other woodland areas. Numerous hunting and fishing cottages are located along these streams practically throughout the undeveloped region of Pennsylvania.

Allegheny Reservoir will have a normal yearly fluctuation of about 60 feet, but most of the fluctuation will occur before or after the principal water-use recreation season, June, July, and August.

Retraction of the reservoir length occurs as indicated as a consequence of draft on flow regulation storage and Dr. Morgan implies that unsightly mud flats will result. Experience at other reservoirs in this district has not developed any problems of such nature. In any event it should be noted that complete evacuation of the total low-flow regulation storage volumes, 549,000 acre-feet in the Allegheny Reservoir and 520,000 acre-feet in the Conewango Reservoir according to Dr. Morgan's plan 6, will result in retracting the surface areas of the reservoirs in the amount of 10,150 and 13,000 acres respectively. That is plan 6 will expose more land. Furthermore, while much of the Allegheny Reservoir is contained within steep hillsides which indicates good drainage, much of the soil in the Conewango Basin is glacial till (a fine silty gravel) and lake sediment or agricultural "muck," as it is referred to locally, both of which have poor drainage characteristics. Much of the portion of the Allegheny Reservoir in New York is quite flat, but generally the shoreline is composed of glacial outwash gravels and sand well suited to the development of beach conditions. From the standpoints of both areal exposure and soil conditions, Allegheny Reservoir is believed to be superior to the Conewango Basin with respect to the mud-flat question raised by Dr. Morgan.

Comment on question 6 by Dr. Arthur E. Morgan: "The answer given here is strikingly contrary to the statements of the study by the Fish and Wildlife Service, by legal requirement included in the Corps of Engineers report on Kinzua. That report covers in detail an impressive list of losses and damages which would result from building Kinzua. A few quotations will illustrate:

" 'Within the project site many structures associated with recreational uses are found. These structures include cabins and summer homes used for short- or long-term vacations by owners or lessees. Within the maximum reservoir elevation, excluding the Cornplanter Indian Reservation in Pennsylvania, the Allegheny State Park, and the Allegany Indian Reservation in New York, at least 239 cabins of this nature have been counted.

" 'The area attracts people from a wide radius, including the population centers of Buffalo, Erie, and Pittsburgh. Many anglers come from the Pittsburgh region in particular. People are also attracted to the site from other States, principally Ohio. A factor contributing to the value of the fishery is the large amount of fishable water readily accessible to the angler.

" 'Many segments of the human population, indivduals, and groups, living within, near, and generally within a radius of 200 miles of the project area have interest in the site of the proposed project in its present condition.

" 'The Allegheny River and its tributaries within the project site is a very popular fishing area for both warm- and cold-water species. Hunting in the project area is popular and many hunters utilize the area each year.

" 'Approximately 42 miles of stream, of which 20 miles are considered good trout streams, will be inundated by the maximum summer low water regulation pool.

" 'A well-utilized area of distinct natural productivity and uncommon attractiveness will be destroyed.

" 'It does not seem reasonable at this time to expect that the major losses to the fish and wildlife resources can be fully compensated.

" 'The esthetics of the area will suffer from the annual appearance of a muddy, unsightly shoreline, especially in New York, where extensive acreages of gradual gradients are found. Moreover, a prime ingredient in determining the relative value of this pool is a full appreciation of the production and esthetically attractive qualities of the main-stem river and its tributary streams as they presently exist.'

"The Engineer Corps sums up the situation as follows:

" '81. Replacement of fish and wildlife resources of the same nature as now exist is indicated in the report as unattainable; however, development of a general plan pursuant to section 3 of the act of August 14, 1946 (60 Stat. 1090) is recommended. Such a plan would be designed to replace present resources with resources of an entirely different nature but would result in an overall enhancement of the area by increasing the variety of fish and wildlife resources.'

"The law referred to requires that the cost of compensating for damages shall be a part of the cost of the project. The report states that a final report will be issued on or about April 30, 1958. Inquiry indicates that this report is being held up by some understanding with the Corps of Engineers. The types of improvement indicated will run into a good many millions of dollars for resources of an entirely different nature. Here, as in the case of forest improvement, it may be claimed that the expenditures are not really compensation for Kinzua damages, as they are resources of an entirely different nature. A very considerable element of cost of Kinzua is being hidden until the work is begun. Then appropriations will be asked for which will increase the cost of Kinzua, probably to more than even the very inflated estimates of the Tippetts report for Conewango.

"The last paragraph of the reply to question 6 gives an inaccurate view of the situation. Kinzua Reservoir has exceedingly steep side slopes, stated by the corps report to be 1½ horizontal to 1 vertical. It is generally inaccessible, except along the valley bottom, along which the lake shore would retreat 10 to 15 miles each year.

"Conewango Reservoir has a flat area at the north end which, in the necessary construction of road and railroad fills, could be given a uniform water level throughout the year. This kind of treatment is not possible for Kinzua because the entire upper Allegheny River flows down the valley, and would wash out any low level dikes. Because of its greater area, Conewango would have a change in elevation, due to storage for low water control, of only 20 feet as against 88 feet for Kinzua. As contrasted to a shoreline retreat down the valley of more than 10 miles between the two elevations of summer storage and low water pool, the fairly uniform retreat around the shores of Conewango would be less than 400 feet; and—as with Kinzua—'most of the fluctuation will occur before or after the principal water-use recreation season, June, July, and August.' "

Question 7. (2) The U.S. Forestry Service has estimated the cost of reconstituting recreation projects in connection with Kinzua Dam at $15 million. Was this expense taken into account in determining the cost-benefit ratio of the project?

Answer. The plan of the U.S. Forest Service for recreational development in and adjacent to the Allegheny National Forest is not for the purpose of reconstituting recreation projects destroyed by Allegheny Reservoir. Conversely, it is basically a program of improvement which the Forest Service envisions will be required to accommodate the great increase in visitation to the area which is expected as a consequence of the attraction of the reservoir. This program is not part of the authorized purpose of the reservoir project and except in relatively minor part, principally adjustment of forest roads for which adequate provision is made in the approved estimate for the reservoir project, would not be a charge against the reservoir nor financed from appropriations for the reservoir. The Allegheny National Forest contains approximately 480,000 acres, only 1,604 of which will lie within the limits of Allegheny Reservoir. The approved estimate for Allegheny Reservoir includes $500,000 for recreational development to serve the normal public needs. The project benefit-cost ratio includes a nominal annual benefit of $25,000 for recreation or a ratio of 1 to 1 for the proposed $500,000 expenditure. The U.S. Forest Service report estimates that benefits for the recreational development program proposed by it would exceed cost in a ratio of 6 to 1.

Comment on question 7 by Dr. Arthur E. Morgan: "The answer to this question states: 'The plan of the U.S. Forest Service for recreational development is not for the purpose of reconstituting recreation projects destroyed by the Allegheny project.' (We did not imply the destruction of recreation projects, but of recreation resources.) The following facts speak for themselves.

"Several thousand acres of forest will be cut along the rivers and mountain sides in creating the reservoir. The stumps would not be removed. As stated in the answer to question 12, 'The type of clearing contemplated, that is to leave the stumps intact to minimize disturbance to existing ground cover,' would leave 25 miles of stumps on each side of the reservoir.

"The law required that a report of the Fish and Wildlife Service be included and made a part of the report on the project. As to the conditions existing 'without the project,' we refer to the quotations from that report given in the comment on question 6. Concerning the means and measures that should be adopted to prevent loss and damage to wildlife resources, the law in question (sec. 2) states:

" 'The cost for planning and construction or installation and maintenance of any such means and measures shall be included in and shall constitute an integral part of the cost of such projects.'

"As the shoreline of the reservoir retreats down river 10 to 15 miles each summer leaving behind on the river banks and mountain sides thousands of acres of dead stumps where there had been natural forests, some consideration must be given to the requirement of the law that effort be made to compensate for such damage, at the cost of the project, though as the Engineer Corps report states, replacement of resources of the same nature is unattainable and replacement must be made with resources of an entirely different nature. Under these circumstances is it not an interesting coincidence that a forestry program which in a limited degree would compensate for these losses by resources of a somewhat different nature should be entirely unrelated to the losses, and would not be a charge against the reservoir nor financed from appropriations for the reservoir?"

Question 8. (3) Has the Corps of Engineers studied the recreational potential of the Conewango-Cattaraugus alternative plan? If so, what were its findings and what value was assigned to such potential in calculating cost-benefit ratios in comparison to the Kinzua Dam? If not, what is the basis used by the Corps of Engineers for comparing the effect of the two proposed projects on recreational facilities?

Answer. No study of recreational potential of Conewango-Cattaraugus has been made since the Conewango plan is considered less desirable than that for the authorized Allegheny Reservoir. The Allegheny Reservoir site is considered to have a greater recreational potential. The forest fringed setting of the reservoir would be an attraction not provided by the Conewango area. Further discussion of the comparative recreational values is contained in response to question 6.

Comment on question 8 by Dr. Arthur E. Morgan: "Conewango, by virtue of its relatively stable water level (10- to 20-foot variation, compared to 60 to 80 for Kinzua), by virtue of a well-defined shoreline and ready access from all directions, and by virtue of its much larger minimum pool area (27 square miles against 3 for Kinzua) would have vastly greater recreation potential."

Question 9. IV. We are informed that one of the reasons given by the Corps of Engineers for preferring Kinzua Dam is that Dr. Morgan's Conewango-Cattaraugus alternative project would require more land. In terms of land acquisition by the Government, it is submitted, cost or value is a far more important consideration than acreage.

In this regard, has the Corps of Engineers made estimates of the value of lands, including Federal lands, needed for the Kinzua Dam and the Conewango-Cattaraugus project? If so, what were these estimates and upon which basis were the appraisals made?

Answer. The evaluations of lands for both projects were made in accordance with professional real estate appraisal methods. The investigations included a compilation of recent sales and interviews with public officials, business firms, utility companies and private owners. Visual appraisal of rural and urban dwellings, business establishments and other enterprises and improvements was made by qualified appraisers. The appraisal of Indian reservation lands was made by a well qualified appraiser of Indian lands. Federal lands in the Allegheny National Forest were not included in the real estate cost. There of 1,604 acres involved, only 805 of which would be below the conservation pool level. The cost estimates for the Allegheny Reservoir and the various diversion plans including Dr. Morgan's recommended plan 6 are contained in table 2 with Dr. Morgan's report. The estimate for Allegheny Reservoir is $8,344,000. The estimate presented by Dr. Morgan for his plan 6 is $16,474,000, which compares with an estimated cost of $16,766,000 prepared by the engineering firm for plan 1. The much greater cost of all of the diversion plans results from the far larger number of improvements which are affected.

Comment on question 9 by Dr. Arthur E. Morgan: "The answer to this question neglects to show that in estimating the cost of Conewango the total cost of all municipal or village property was included, regardless of whether a considerable part of the municipality would be undisturbed. Nor does the answer reveal the fact that by far the greater part of the estimated cost is in these villages, and that they need not be destroyed, as is the case with Kinzua villages, but that the low portions could be relocated on higher land in the same village."

Question 10. V. Dr. Morgan contends that the Kinzua Reservoir will eliminate the only water level highway through the mountains in that region, one of the finest highway locations in Pennsylvania, and that there will be substituted a steep, two-lane highway along the precipitous mountainside, with grades of 10 percent with sharp curves.

1. Is this specific contention correct? How will the substitute road rate, if measured by the minimum standards for through highways established by the American Society of Highway Officials? Apart from actual construction costs, how was the lessening of quality of highways figured in the cost-benefit ratio of the Kinzua project?

Answer. The highway route in the Allegheny River Valley which Dr. Morgan refers to as a water level route and one of the finest highway locations in Pennsylvania consists of Pennsylvania Route 59 from the dam site to Sugar Run, Pa., Route 346 from Sugar Run to Corydon, Pa., and Pennsylvania Legislative Route 630 from Corydon to the Pennsylvania-New York State line. Only Route 59 is a primary highway. Route 59 in the affected reach contains 8 curves sharper than the maximum acceptable 9° for modern standards for a highway of this class and these 8 curves average 40°. It also crosses the Salamanca Branch of the Pennsylvania Railroad at grade at two locations. Similarly, Route 346 contains 23 curves averaging 23° and involves four railroad grade crossings and poor sight distances. The alinement and grades of the affected portion of Legislative Route 630 (1.6 miles) are good but the road is of narrow width and low quality.

The substitute roads in the Allegheny Reservoir will be constructed to A.A.S.H.O. standards for the classes of roads involved, which would limit maximum curvature to 9° and grades to 7 percent on Routes 59 and 346. The Pennsylvania Department of Highways has requested that the relocation of Legislative Route 630 be constructed to recreation road standards which will provide increased width but will permit curvature up to 15° and grades up to 10 percent. This relocation will not be a part of a primary system.

There is no lessening in quality of highways to be relocated for Allegheny Reservoir. The basic criterion for road relocations is to provide an equivalent substitute for the existing system, and it should be evident that no highway department will accept a system inferior to that which it now has. The relocated Route 59 will be a much more direct and shorter connection between the communities served than the existing route. The alinement of the Route 346 relocation has not been finally determined but the amount allotted thereto in the project estimate is far the most costly of any of the alternatives under consideration.

Comment on question 10 by Dr. Arthur E. Morgan: "It is not the present highway surface, but the highway route that is greatly superior. The reason why this very excellent water level route through the mountains is not now well developed is that the threat of Kinzua prevented. It is by far the best water level highway route through the mountains for a considerable distance. This is made clear in the Engineer Corps report. which states that the roads in the Allegheny River Valley are 'located on generally flat lying areas, adjacent to the stream bed, with only minor grades, with exceptionally good sight distances, and where maintenance problems are normal.' The report draws attention to the inferior location of the relocated road.

"When I showed sections of the profile for the new or relocated road to the Chief of Engineers, he said indignantly that they were not Engineer Corps roads, that the corps would never plan such roads. Yet he was looking at the profiles of the road planned to take the place of the water level route, with grades up to 10 percent, and with 13 miles of extra distance between Warren and Salamanca.

"Of course this relocated road cannot be a part of any primary system, for the quality would be too low. Nor does the answer draw attention to the fact that this steep crooked road would have only two lanes, except in one short stretch. To be made a decent road, especially for winter travel, it would need three or four lanes, which would require a vast amount of rock excavation and would cost $25 million to $50 million additional. That expense is avoided at present and left to the future.

"The answer to this question confuses and belabors the issue, but in no way faces it."

Question 11. 2. Does the Conewango-Cattaraugus alternative plan require any comparable shift from a superior to an inferior road? If not, was this advantage weighed in calculating the relative merits of the two proposals?

Answer. The Allegheny Reservoir will not involve a shift from a superior to an inferior road system nor would any diminution in quality be acceptable to the highway department for the road system involved in the Conewango-Cattaraugus plan.

Comment on question 11 by Dr. Arthur E. Morgan: "The answer to this question is directly misleading. The present road has not been modernized because of the expectation that it would be moved. The route of this road, which is excellent, would be replaced by an extremely inferior route as explained above."

Question 12. VI. Dr. Morgan contends that the Corps of Engineers has inflated its estimates for carrying out the Conewango-Cattaraugus alternative plan in the following respects, among others: (1) by applying the same unit costs for construction in a mountainous area for the Kinzua Dam to construction in a level area for the Conewango-Cattaraugus alternative project; (2) by adding over $8 million in unnecessary costs for the raising of the roadbed of the Pennsylvania Railroad; and (3) by adding the cost of rebuilding highways in excess of needs:

In calculating the expense of highway relocation, did the Corps of Engineers apply the unit costs for steep mountainside rock and earth excavation, as needed in the Kinzua project, without change to excavation on flatland where there is no rock, as would be required for the Conewango-Cattaraugus alternative? Did the Corps of Engineers apply the unit costs for clearing timber on mountainsides and along a river bank (Kinzua), without change, to land-clearing operations in a level, easily accessible area (Conewango-Cattaraugus)?

Answer. In estimating the expense of high relocations for the Conewango diversion plans, prices per mile for the three classifications of highway involved were established from data furnished by the New York State Department of Public Works and from cost records for road construction in comparable terrain. Estimates for major structures have been prepared on a cost-per-square-foot basis for similar type structures. The same unit costs were not used in estimating costs of highway construction for Allegheny Reservoir and the Conewango diversion plans studied by TAMS.[1] Excluding the cost of structures and crossings, the cost per mile for Allegheny Reservoir highway relocations is 23 percent higher for State-Federal aid routes, 37 percent higher for country roads, and 50 percent higher for town roads than was used in the TAMS report for the diversion plans, indicating the effect of topography on road construction costs. Highway clearing costs are included in these figures. For large highway structures, which predominate in the Conewango plans, the estimate of structure cost per square foot is 54 percent higher for Allegheny Reservoir than was estimated by TAMS for the Conewango plans.

The same unit prices for reservoir clearing were used in estimating the cost of this item for both Allegheny Reservoir and the Conewango Reservoir. The type of clearing contemplated, that is to leave stumps intact to minimize disturbance to existing ground cover to avoid erosion, and to salvage merchantable timber, would be the same for both reservoirs. Use of heavy equipment to uproot trees and stumps is not proposed. Timber to be cleared in the Conewango Basin is not as heavily concentrated as in the Allegheny Reservoir is less extensive. The greater amount of clearing in the Allegheny Reservoir tends to be more suitable to efficient use of the salvage techniques. Much more wet-bottom conditions are involved in the Conewango area. Overall it is believed that the unit costs in the two areas would be reasonably comparable.

Comment on question 12 by Dr. Arthur E. Morgan: "The answer states: 'The same unit costs were not used in estimating cost for highway construction for Allegheny Reservoir and the Conewango diversion plans studied by TAMS.' The question related to excavation costs on steep rocky mountainsides of the Kinzua project and for the flat land, with practically no rock, in Conewango.

"On the Kinzua project the estimated cost of excavation for rock and earth on the steep, rocky mountainsides is $1 per cubic yard. The major volume of excavation for Conewango is on level, firm land where there is no rock. Its unit cost is stated in the report to be the same as for dams and dikes. The estimated unit cost given in the report for dams and dikes is $1 per cubic yard. Thus this answer is explicitly inaccurate.

"With reference to land clearing costs, the statement of facts in the answer is so inaccurate and the conclusions so unreasonable as to be meaningless. The conditions for clearing on the flat, very firm bottom lands of Conewango are almost ideal for heavy clearing equipment. Nearly all the Conewango timber clearing is in solid blocks of one or more square miles. The Kinzua clearing is mostly on very steep, rocky slopes, or on the more than 100 miles of river banks and island shores, where trees fall into the water when cut, and have to be dragged out individually.

"The statement, 'The type of clearing contemplated, that is to leave stumps intact to minimize disturbance to existing ground cover,' and to salvage merchantable timber, 'would be the same in both,' would be inaccurate if intelligence should be used in clearing. The very flat Conewango bottoms would not suffer erosion. Large-scale land clearing operations removing the entire tree would cost less than half as much as the method prescribed for Kinzua, even if both were on flat ground. Considering the method indicated for Kinzua, Conewango clearing would probably cost not more than a third as much, and the saving would probably be much greater than the $2 million estimated. Merchantable timber would be removed ahead of the land clearing operation.

"This item, where the overestimate is about $2 million, is so clear that any effort to cover up the difference is obvious to anyone familiar with the conditions."

Question 13. 2. Although alleging that Dr. Morgan's proposal for relocation of the Pennsylvania Railroad "cannot be accepted as a sound practice" for estimating costs in comparison to the Kinzua project, has not the Corps of Engineers in fact accepted a substantially similar proposal for relocation of the Chesapeake & Ohio Railroad in connection with the Fishtrap Reservoir project?

Answer. The Chesapeake & Ohio Railroad operates a spur track between its mainline at Millard, Ky., and the mining town of Dunlap, Ky., in the valley to be occupied by the proposed Fishtrap Reservoir. The principal customer on this line is also served by the Norfolk & Western Railroad. Since the C. & O. line generally operates only 1 train a day on this spur to deliver from 25 to 30 empty cars and pick up an equal number of loads, and because the line is presently subject to flooding annually, the Corps of Engineers proposed abandonment and purchase of the property in lieu of relocation. The railroad has requested consideration of a plan whereby the line would be relocated to about the 8-year flood frequency level in the reservoir with a tunnel through the dam at the 14-year flood frequency level employing a 1.5-percent grade to attain this level at the dam. Fishtrap Dam will be a concrete structure and only a short tunnel would be required. Track settlement would not be a problem and the arrangement would be readily adapted to installation of a gated structure for closure during floods. The Corps of Engineers has agreed to consider the railroad's proposal provided it can be shown that the cost of relocation is not substantially in excess of the cost of abandonment and purchase and contingent upon receipt of suitable release from future claims against the Government for flooding due to operation of the reservoir.

On the other hand, the Salamanca Branch of the Pennsylvania Railroad, to which Dr. Morgan compares the Fishtrap situation, is a part of a railroad facility providing through freight traffic between Pittsburgh, Buffalo, and Rochester. This railroad operates the Salamanca Branch as a northbound one-way track for through traffic, and for local freights both ways. Considering the length of tunnel required (a minimum of 210 feet), the special construction treatment to assure stability of the structure, as well as the need for costly facilities to maintain traffic during construction, it is apparent that Fishtrap situation is not substantially similar, nor is the estimate used by Dr. Morgan for this feature considered to be representative of the work involved. From our experience in railroad relocations, there is no reason to anticipate that a scheme to pass the railroad through the dam, which would in effect provide the railroad with a lesser facility than is now available, would be acceptable to the Pennsylvania Railroad.

Comment on question 13 by Dr. Arthur E. Morgan: "As to railroad relocation, the answer shows that the writer wholly misunderstands the situation. There would be practically no interference with traffic, as the new location would be parallel to the present track and just far enough away to prevent any interruption of operation. The crossing through the dam would be on solid rock. There would be no more problem than carrying a railroad track between two walls conveniently spaced. The error of more than $8 million is so clear as to be unmistakable. The Tippetts estimate is more than 10 times higher than that made by one of the most experienced railroad relocation men in America.

"This is a striking instance of using a confusion of words to cover up an obvious error. When I brought the more economical treatment to the attention of the young man who made the estimate for the Engineer Corps consultants, his response was, 'I never thought of that.'"

Question 14. 3. Do the Corps of Engineers figures for highway relocation under the Conewango-Cattaraugus alternative include the cost of building a farm highway (M–14), serving about 30 families, to a higher standard than U.S. Route No. 62, approximately parallel and a quarter of a mile away? Do these figures also include cost for rebuilding several miles of another highway (H–31)? Would such rebuilding of H–31 be necessary if a low fill of 300 feet were made along the reservoir flow line?

Answer. The relocation plans for the roads for the Conewango plans were developed with the cooperation of the New York Department of Public Works and the supervisors of the affected county and town road systems and are based on data concerning traffic use, standard of road construction and traffic management. Undoubtedly some adjustments in highway relocations for the Conewango diversion plans could be made through negotiations with the owning agencies on the basis of further detailed engineering planning. However, such modification in plan as might result therefrom are not usually of significant overall effect. Adjustments in plan have a tendency to be offsetting, that is both increases and decreases result from detail planning. In the case of the two examples of possible savings cited in this question the following situation exists:

(a) Road H–14 is required to replace several local roads leading toward the Conewango Valley which would be inundated by the Conewango Reservoir plans. The standard of construction assumed is that published by the county and town having jurisdiction over the affected roads. This standard is not higher than that of U.S. Route 62 as alleged. A minor adjustment might be possible if more detail topography were available to justify a shorter tie-in to the existing road on an acceptable grade.

(b) Rebuilding or improving several miles of H–31 is necessary and could not be avoided by construction of 300 feet of low fill. Consideration must be give to the fact that the Conewango plans affect a well-developed road net where seven roads cross the reservoir area east to west and five roads run north to south and provide connections with the east-west crossings. This system would be completely destroyed by the Conewango plans with resultant pressure on remaining and relocated roads to handle necessary concentrations of traffic at certain points and a general change in traffic pattern. It is frequently necessary in reservoir projects to improve an existing road not within the water area to accommodate traffic previously carried by roads within the reservoir which are not relocated.

Comment on question 14 by Dr. Arthur E. Morgan: "The answer contains many words to cover up extreme carelessness or intentional loading up of highway costs. The answer states, for instance, with reference to a local road serving about 30 families: 'This stand is not higher than that of U.S. Route No. 62 as alleged.' Personal examination on the ground makes certain that U.S. Route No. 62 running parallel and a few hundred feet distant, is of a standard far lower than that specified for this farm road serving 30 families.

"As to route H–31, the proposed relocated road would intersect the same roads as the existing road and only a small fraction of a mile away. The only point at which the reservoir would touch the existing road is a stretch of about 300 feet where it crosses a small draw. The several miles of new road parallel to the existing road, at about half a million dollars a mile, are wholly unjustified. None of the conditions mentioned as requiring this proposed expense of several million dollars exist in this case. Only a few little-traveled roads in this area would be affected, except the road in question. The answer is patently an effort to cover up a grossly improper expense. Of course, the State highway authorties would accept a gift of several millions of dollars of free highway, built by standards exceeding anything existing in that region.

Question 15. VII. We would appreciate being furnished a copy of the cost-benefit figures determined by the Corps of Engineers for the Conewango-Cattaraugus alternative plan before that proposal was rejected by the Corps of Engineers. In this connection, what value, if any was assigned, under Dr. Morgan's proposal, to the protection provided by such proposal from floods of the cities and towns along lower Conewango Creek, including Kennedy, Russell and Warren?"

Answer. Pasic data are not available to the Corps of Engineers to support a reasonable estimate of cost for the Conewango-Cattaraugus alternative proposed by Dr. Morgan, and accordingly it has not been possible to determine a firm benefit-cost ratio for that plan. To develop an accurate cost estimate for such a complex scheme involving large quantities and widely dispersed hydraulic structures and channels, many underground explorations with associated tests, and accurate surveys for use in hydraulic studies would be needed. The material included in Dr. Morgan's report provides no valid basis for a reduction in the engineering firm's estimate for plan 1 which Dr. Morgan states is the same as his plan 6 except for the outlet channel to Lake Erie. The engineering firm's estimate for plan 1 was over $142 million, or over $31 million more than the then current estimate for the authorized Allegheny Reservoir. Further refinement in that estimate which would require extensive engineering investigations is not considered to be necessary to arrive at an appraisal of Dr. Morgan's plan in relation to the authorized Allegheny Reservoir.

Dr. Morgan derives his estimate of benefits as follows:

(a) He takes all benefits estimated for Allegheny Reservoir as applicable to his plan after reducing them by a 6-percent factor to compensate for the lesser drainage area control provided by his plan. Allegheny Reservoir controls 2,180 square miles of the Allegheny River. Dr. Morgan's plan would control 1,770 square miles of Allegheny River and 280 square miles of Conewango Creek drainage area for a total of 2,050 square miles. Assuming that control in Conewango Valley is fully equivalent to an equal area in the Allegheny River (it is not, since in its present state the Conewango Valley is a natural retarding basis which produces a low flat flood crest at its confluence with the Allegheny River in contrast to the much sharper crest of the latter), the areal relationship would (as stated by Dr. Morgan) be 2,050÷2,180=94 percent.

(b) He accepts an annual benefit of $230,000 for hydroelectric power energy value from the section of the TAMS report which discusses advantages and disadvantages of the alternative plans without adjustment for the loss of 36 square miles of drainage area resulting from his upstream movement of the site of the Allegheny River diversion dam.

(c) He dervies a flood control benefit of $725,000 annually for the Ohio-Mississippi system below the mouth of the Cumberland River by assuming that discharge from Allegheny Reservoir "probably would be added to any flood in the lower river." His derivation assumes a holdout of 25,000 cubic feet per second at a unit value of $27 which is escalated to reflect price level increase to obtain his benefit of $725,000 annually. The $27 value used is the unit value of a reduction of one cubic foot per second on the crest discharge of a project flood at Cairo, Ill. This data was furnished Dr. Morgan by the Corps of Engineers and is quoted in his report of October 1958.

Dr. Morgan's derivation must assume either that continuous releases of 25,000 cubic feet per second are made from Allegheny Reservoir throughout the flood season or that releases of flood storage in that volume after individual floods would be undiminished and would coincide with flood crests in the lower Ohio and Mississippi Rivers. Neither assumption is tenable. Examination of discharge records reveals that in essentially all major Mississippi River flood periods the releases of flood storage from Allegheny Reservoir would reach the Mississippi River on the recession side of Mississippi River floods. Moreover, the Allegheny Reservoir releases would be substantially reduced in magnitude in the 1,200-mile travel to the Mississippi. Dr. Morgan's estimate of $725,000 for benefits to his Conewango diversion plan due to "elimination" of an adverse effect of Allegheny Reservoir on the lower Ohio and Mississippi Rivers therefore is not realistic and cannot be recognized. If this is eliminated from his total estimated annual benefits of $6,135,000, there remains a total of $5,410,000, which is $100,000 less than the estimated benefits from the Allegheny Reservoir.

Owning to the minor nature of flood damages along lower Conewango Creek, the prevention of such damages has not been evaluated. At Kennedy, N.Y., flood damage during the maximum flood of record was limited to road flooding. At Russell, Pa., 7 dwelling units and about 20 cottages were flooded. No report of damage was made to the U.S. Weather Bureau which normally obtains such information after each flood. It is evident, therefore, that flood damage is not extensive. At Warren, the flood problem along the Conewango Creek section of the city results from the effects of backwater from Allegheny River. With Allegheny River controlled by a dam at the Kinzua site there would be no flood damages in the city of Warren from any Conewango Creek discharge of record. With Dr. Morgan's plan 6 as proposed, the small value of protecting the lower Conewango Valley would be far outweighed by increased damages to Cattaraugus Creek caused by discharge.

Comments on question 15 by Dr. Arthur E. Morgan: "To adequately discuss the many assumptions made in the answer to this question would demand excessive time and space. The benefits claimed by the corps for reservoir capacity have great limitations not existing for those described for removal of floodwater from the Ohio and Mississippi. The corps now contemplates the expenditure of many hundreds of millions of dollars for reservoir construction for reducing flood flows on the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers. The removal of all upper Allegheny flood flow from the Allegheny, Ohio and Mississippi Rivers would reduce the need for expenditures for such reservoirs by probably between $100 million and $200 million.

"The estimates of value from this source which earlier have been indicated for Conewango are very conservative, and probably should be tripled."

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEATING. I am happy to yield.

Mr. JAVITS. I should like fully to support and identify myself with the very fine expression, so ably made, as is his wont, by my colleague, Senator KEATING. I, too, have been very deeply concerned by the situation, particularly as it is reflected in the Seneca Reservation, which involves an enormous amount of local concern, and properly so.

The United States has a treaty with the Seneca Nation, the Pickering Treaty, which guarantees title to this land and also provides expressly that the Senecas shall not be disturbed in their possession of the land. To follow through with this project would be to abrogate what is one of our oldest treaties.

It is true that there are a great many local reasons, but I do not make my argument upon local grounds at all, or even upon moral grounds, although they are important considerations in deciding what plan should be adopted for this situation, which affects also our neighbor and sister State.

I know that my colleague from New York, Senator KEATING, has raised a good many questions in addition to the question of the Seneca Indians, especially with reference to the plan of Dr. Arthur Morgan. We feel very deeply and sincerely that many questions have not been satisfactorily resolved, such as which of the two plans would displace fewer people, which would usurp the most land, and which would cost more. There are also other questions which have not been fully answered. There is the elementary question of whether there are any known recreational developments which would be affected. There are other questions, also.

Therefore, we have felt that further investigation, under the House joint resolution which is pending in the matter, was a good way to obtain that information. We are faced with a reality, as my colleague from New York has said, and apparently the time has gone by for these protests. Hence, my colleague and I make a further suggestion. Of course, Senator KEATING and I have been constantly active together in this matter. The suggestion is that, notwithstanding the proposed appropriations, which undoubtedly will be made, the Corps of Engineers at our request will review the elements of Dr. Morgan's plan, in the hope—and I know my colleague shares my view in this—that if they cannot accept the main parts of it—and obviously that question is decided in this appropriation bill—they may take some parts of it.

I should like to say also that my colleague from New York has been a most important factor in this fight, as is shown by his excellent speech today. I have tried to do my part, too. I can pledge to the people of that area, and to the Senecas, that we will attempt to do all we can to at least alleviate if not obviate the great disadvantages and difficulties which they contemplate from this situation.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I am grateful to my distinguished colleague for his remarks. He has been in the forefront of the effort to prevent this injustice to the Seneca Nation, and to bring about a solution of this problem in a manner which would be in the best interest of the Seneca Nation, the State of New York and our country.

The suggestion he has made is most worthy and I will be happy to join with him in further representations to the Corps of Engineers. They have proved to be reasonable men in the many dealings I have had with them. I have a very high regard for the Corps of Engineers. I served in the Army under a man whom I naturally believe to be the greatest Chief of Engineers of all time, Raymond A. Wheeler, sometimes known as "Spec" Wheeler. I have a very deep affection and a great admiration for him. He represents to me the Corps of Engineers at its best. I am always unhappy when I find myself in disagreement with the conclusions they have reached.

My colleague from New York [Mr. JAVITS] has made a suggestion which he and I should follow up, and will follow up. Knowing the chairman and members of the committee as I do, I am sure the committee is anxious to arrive at the best answer. If the Corps of Engineers decides that a portion of the Conewango-Cattaraugus plan, combined with the other, is the right answer, I am certain they will be sympathetic to the report of the Corps of Engineers.

I am grateful to my colleague from New York for the great help he has been, and for the fine statement he has made on the floor of the Senate.

I am now happy to yield to the distinguished Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the junior Senator from New York if it is true that the plan of the celebrated engineer, Arthur E. Morgan, calls for the diversion of water from the Allegheny-Ohio-Mississippi Basin into Lake Erie and thence out over Niagara Falls through the St. Lawrence?

Mr. KEATING. It is my understanding that it does.

Mr. DOUGLAS. This is an extremely good suggestion, and we from Illinois would be prepared to support it, not only on its own merits, but because with added water going into Lake Erie and over Niagara Falls, generating additional power both there and along the St. Lawrence, it would help the Chicago lake diversion plan to go through.

Under those circumstances I would think that the opposition of my two good friends from New York State, which has been very heated and very effective, against lake diversion at Chicago, would be removed, because they would then have the water for the purpose they have espoused, and this would make good any loss of water to the Great Lakes system at Chicago. I wonder if my good friends will not agree that if their plan goes through, they should join us on the lake diversion plan at Chicago.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I think it would be better to consider that problem if and when it comes up.

At the moment, in view of the fact that the Kinzua site, and not the Conewango-Cattaraugus site, is virtually assured of approval, I feel that the question poses a mere academic situation.

But I assure the Senator from Illinois that any bill, which he has relating to diversion in Illinois, and, which does not, in my judgment, adversely affect New York, will always receive the most careful and sympathetic consideration.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Do I correctly understand the Senator from New York to say that he wants for New York the existing flow of water plus the water which he would divert into Lake Erie—that he wants all this and heaven too?

Mr. KEATING. If the Senator from New York were of a purely selfish nature, which I know the Senator from Illinois would not charge him with being——

Mr. DOUGLAS. I would not charge him with it.

Mr. KEATING. He would say, "Yes, he would like all the water he could get, with this exception: The Senator from New York also realizes that too high a water level in the Great Lakes—Lake Ontario, particularly—might cause great damage to some of the lakeshore owners. But the Senator from New York would like to have that thing done which would be best for New York, just as the Senator from Illinois does so forcefully look after the interests of his own State.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I may say that I think generally, it is a good thing to divert water from the Ohio-Mississippi system into the Lake Erie-St. Lawrence system, because the floods on the Ohio and Mississippi are very real. That basin has too much water. I think it would therefore be a distinct advantage to get this proposed flow into Lake Erie. It would also be a distinct benefit to the State of New York and our sister country to the north—Canada—in the added production of power.

Since the Senator's State of New York would be getting, under this plan, an added flow of water, he should certainly wish to share the benefits, should he not, with other States, and would permit Illinois to have an added thousand cubic feet of water per second, at Chicago for sanitary purposes? It would not affect the lake levels because, as a matter of fact, Lake Erie would, I believe, be getting more than a thousand cubic feet of water per second in this way, so the lake levels would not be adversely affected, and there would be a backup, and Lake Huron and Lake Michigan would not be hurt. On the contrary their levels would also rise.

I see the distinguished Senator from Ohio in the Chamber. He is interested in the level of Lake Erie. So this seems like a very happy circumstance in which the various States can get together, provided we of Illinois know that we will not be shortchanged in the process.

Mr. KEATING. With the concurrence of my distinguished senior colleague from New York [Mr. JAVITS], I extend a cordial invitation to the Senator from Illinois to join with us in the letter to the Chief of Engineers, urging a reconsideration of this matter. Then we can cross the other bridge when we come to it. If New York has more water than it can use, there is no State with which we would rather share that water than the great State of Illinois.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I may say that it is a good idea to have the various decisions synchronized, so that all who are interested may proceed simultaneously, rather than simply to secure for New York additional quantities of water, and have no understanding as to the possibility of Chicago and Illinois getting needed water.

Mr. KEATING. That is true; but I know that none of us—least of all, the distinguished Senator from Illinois—would want to appear to be making any deal here.

Mr. DOUGLAS. No; it would simply be an understanding; not a deal, but an understanding.

Mr. KEATING. We would not have it appear that any agreement was being entered into with respect to water to get support for our project. That would be the farthest from our thoughts.

Mr. DOUGLAS. As a disciple of Woodrow Wilson, I believe in open covenants, openly arrived at.

I make this statement on the floor because I think it will help to reconcile the interests of the lake States. The Senator's proposal will put water in the lake system, into the Niagara, and into the St. Lawrence. Since there is to be an addition there, there can also be a subtraction at the Chicago River. I bring this matter to the attention of the Senator from New York because I think these are constructive questions which he has raised, but they become clearly desirable only on condition that all may share in the benefits, and that the rest of the Nation is not to be regarded as a mere tributary to the State of New York which will be benefited.

Mr. KEATING. The statement which I believe is implicit in the remarks of the Senator from Illinois is one the senior Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] and I would be glad to include in our letter to the Chief of Engineers. I will be pleased to submit a draft of our letter to the Senator from Illinois for his perusal with the hope that he will find it desirable to join with us in our endeavor.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Some months ago I asked the Engineers to go into this matter. I did it out of sympathy for the Seneca Nation and also out of some anticipation that we might get a better distribution of water for the benefit of the Great Lakes system and for Chicago.

Mr. KEATING. If we were to enlist the help of the Senator from Illinois, I am sure it would be useful.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, with the permission of the distinguished Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER], I should like to make a brief statement on another aspect of the bill which affects New York. I asked the Senator from Louisiana about this, and he is agreeable to my proceeding on this subject.

Mr. President, the consideration by the Senate of the bill appropriating funds for the operation of the executive branch of the Federal Government for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1960, affords an appropriate opportunity to record a deep and growing concern on my part and on the part of my colleagues representing the State of New York in Congress regarding the increasingly apparent trend affecting both the Nation and particularly that part of the Nation which lies along the eastern seaboard.

The trend is simply this: A disproportionate flow to the western part of the country of federally sponsored scientific and defense projects, in the form of contracts and Government-owned facilities. This includes military projects, contracts related to the exploration of space, and atomic energy facilities and installations. Even more disturbing to me is that this is a trend which is accelerating.

I fully appreciate and respect the competence and fairness of the judgments which are brought to bear by officials of the executive branch of the Government in the selection of the location of individual contracts and projects, and I do not dispute in the main the technical considerations which govern these individual actions. I am not, therefore, questioning the wisdom or justification of any individual action of any agency of the executive branch of the Government. I do, however, suggest that the cumulative effect of all of these project location actions during the past several years has resulted in a flow of Federal business to the western as opposed to the eastern part of the Nation.

There are undoubtedly many excellent reasons why this has been the case, among them the consideration that many defense-oriented industries are situated in less populous and open spaces of the west where experimental scientific work can be conveniently pursued.

I do not wish to suggest any diminution in the importance of the technical and economic criteria which are taken into account in the location of any specific project. Nevertheless, that there is perhaps another equally important criterion that should apply in those instances where purely technical and economic considerations do not in themselves suggest a clear answer to the question of the location of any particular project or work. This vital criterion is the impact of Federal procurement on our overall national interest. Such a criterion is nothing more than a realization that Federal contracts and federally owned facilities affect the health and vigor of the overall national economy.

I have in mind in this connection a specific provision of the appropriations bill which is now before this body. This provision appropriates funds for a $24 million nuclear test reactor facility to be constructed by the Atomic Energy Commission. That is dealt with in this bill.

The State of New York, in accordance with its official atomic development program, proposed to the Atomic Energy Commission that this facility, to perform atomic energy irradiation services for private industry as well as the Federal Government, be constructed in the northeastern United States where no such facility now exists. To help make this possible, the State of New York proposed that it acquire and make available a site within the State at which the proposed facility could be located, or, alternatively, proposed that the State participate financially in the project to the extent of the cost of a site if the project were located at an already existing Federal installation within the State.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York speak louder?

Mr. JAVITS. I am sorry; I was trying to move along quickly, in deference to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. ANDERSON. I understand; but the Senator was referring to the construction of works in Idaho. There are strong reasons why they should be built in Idaho.

Mr. JAVITS. I shall bring the Senator up to date.

The main point is that we believe there are other criteria where there is not such a clear indication as with respect to the scientific and economic criteria, and that they ought, more and more, to come into consideration in an effort, at least, to moderate the tremendous flow West which has taken place with respect to the location of particular installations and the investment of particular procurements.

In this respect, we gave as an example—and that is what I was just saying—the nuclear test reactor facility to be constructed by the AEC—a $24 million reactor. I was about to point out that the State of New York, which has an official atomic energy development program of its own, propose to the Atomic Energy Commission that this particular nuclear reactor facility be constructed in the Northeastern United States. The State of New York offered to make available a site within the State, or, alternatively, proposed that the State of New York participate financially in the project. In other words, we offered a site or to share the cost of the installation if it was placed on the site of another Federal installation already in the State.

The New York congressional delegation—as is true of other State delegations—operates in matters of this kind regardless of party, and has endorsed and supported this proposal unanimously.

The Atomic Energy Commission has notified us that it intends to proceed with the construction of the proposed project at its established reservation in the State of Idaho, where two similar facilities, serving private industry, as well as the Federal Government, are already in being.

The Atomic Energy Commission, in the opinion of our people in New York—and we have a program there with a commissioner and an organization—has given logical reasons in justification for locating this facility in Idaho. We do not wish to take issue with the Commission with respect to those reasons. However, we are concerned with the effect of the decision, when taken together with the effect of a series of related decisions, on the prospects of permitting the substantial industry in the northeast to play an equitable role in atomic development in the Nation.

Recently we have seen the Atomic Energy Commission begin the construction of a $15 million atomic power prototype reactor of advanced experimental design at the Commission's reservation in the State of Washington. We have seen also the commencement of construction of an $18.5 million submarine reactor prototype at the Commission's reservation at Idaho, and we have seen the commencement of work on a $145 million plutonium production reactor, convertible to electric power generation in the amount of 700,000 kilowatts, in the State of Washington. Congress in this session has received a request for authorization of a $115 million nuclear particle accelerator in California—an authorization that has not been passed, but which probably will be reconsidered next year.

In an equivalent period in the field of atomic energy, only a handful of relatively small projects have been initiated in the east—totaling millions of dollars in estimated cost.

We are calling attention to the trend represented by these instances. We do not challenge the individual decisions. The source of our concern and that of our colleagues is the trend; and it is likewise the source of the concern of eastern industry. It goes well beyond the example I have used in regard to atomic energy installations, for this trend affects many other aspects of Federal military and scienttfic endeavors, as well.

I call attention to this trend at this time, in making this statement on the floor of the Senate, as an invitation to thoughtful consideration by Members of the Congress, including the very distinguished and able Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON], who has been so great a leader in this field, and also by the scientific and military agencies of the Federal Government.

I think some agencies of the Federal Government make too little effort to make suggestions which will result in having our people sharpen their pencils and use their best brains and organize the industries in their own States in such a way as to come abreast of the increasing tendency to remove to the West, rather than to "give a break" to the Northeast and to New York. This is nothing but a caveat, as we lawyers say—a plea in that regard, and pointing out that the trend is accelerating. That is the purpose of these remarks.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield?

Mr. KEATING. I yield.

Mr. ANDERSON. Of course I appreciate the way in which the Senator from New York has presented this matter. When the matter of the reactor in Idaho came up, I am sure the Commission took into consideration the fact that it had two other installations there which would work in harmony with this one, and that the Navy already was active in the area, with facilities which would require the use of this reactor.

Let me say to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DWORSHAK], who is now in the Chamber, and who is a member of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, that he passed on this item, as did others, without regard to where the installation might be located. So far as I know, he did not suggest that it be located in Idaho. It has been located there because the Atomic Energy Commission, after surveying all the facilities, thought that was the proper place. I am happy that the Senator recognizes that that was the determining factor on the part of the Atomic Energy Commission.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, the head of our New York Office of Atomic Development is Oliver Townsend, an extremely competent person, and today I have been expressing his views. He is very highly respected.

I am very glad the Senator spoke so temperately on this question, and I hope he will give some consideration to the policy question we have raised.

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes. I hope New York will allow its power authority to work with the Commission. Thus far, it has dealt with private industry.

Mr. JAVITS. I certainly will communicate with our people on that subject, and then will communicate directly with the Senator as to their reply.

Mr. ANDERSON. I thank the Senator from New York.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I want to express my complete approval of and agreement with the remarks made by my distinguished colleague.

It is not for us to substitute our judgment for that of those who have so thoroughly studied this problem as regards the location of this specific plant. But we do feel strongly that atomic development is a subject with respect to which geographical considerations should, to an appropriate degree, enter into our decisions.

As my colleague knows, the entire subject of defense projects and contracts for other types of Federal installations has concerned me very deeply ever since I first came to the Senate. So far as New York has been concerned, the amounts of our defense contracts have declined over a period of 4 years, until now all of us agree that something must be done to try to reverse the continuing trend. I agree with my colleague that the word "trend" is the key to this entire issue.

Perhaps by our joint efforts, we have at least stemmed the tide, for there has been some improvement in the situation, insofar as our State is concerned, over the past several years.

I do not wish to be understood as considering this matter entirely from a parochial point of view. Once or twice several of my colleagues from California have indicated that they feel this is our point of view. I do not wish to be understood as saying that any contracts for these installations should be let on a solely geographical basis. That would not be appropriate. But I do believe that it is entirely proper for us to bring this matter to the attention of the Senate, as my distinguished colleague has again done; and by doing so I believe he has performed a definite service to the people of the State of New York and to all the rest of us.

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. President——

Mr. KEATING. I am happy to yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. President, I appreciate the alertness of and the interest displayed by the Senators from New York, in trying to get larger participation by the State of New York in the development of atomic energy.

But I wish to point out that a few years ago, when the National Testing Reactor Station was established on the sagebrush plains in isolated sections of Idaho, the site was selected primarily because of its isolation from the congested population areas of the country. It was then recognized, as it is today, that many hazards are involved in the development of atomic energy; and that is probably the basic reasons why so many of these reactors are being located in Idaho.

I want to associate myself with the comments made by my colleague from New Mexico that political considerations probably play a very minor part in the selection of sites for the building of reactors. In the case of the one to which reference has been made in the debate, approval was given and funds were provided by the appropriate committees without knowing in advance where the location would be. The fact that subsequently Idaho was selected for the building of that particular reactor was not the result of any political pressure or geographical considerations, but primarily because of the need of building such reactors in an area far removed from the congested centers of population.

Mr. KEATING. I am sure the representations made by the distinguished Senator from Idaho are correct, but I would not want them to downgrade in any way his very great effectiveness as a U.S. Senator, which I appreciate, whether it benefits or does not benefit the particular interests of my State.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEATING. I yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I have been examining my mail, and I have a letter which has some pertinency to the subject. I shall not identify the names involved, but the letter reads:

> The May 25 issue of _____ newspaper quoted Senator X as stating that since 1936 his State received $700 million in Federal grants in return for tax contributions by the same State of only $312 million. God forbid that this information be kept from the national public. Should our leadership permit this type of thing to continue we are worthy of no more than national bankruptcy. Even if this information is only 50 percent correct, as the result of political expediency, it is still criminal that it should apply.

I may say it does not apply to Idaho.

Mr. KEATING. Nor would it apply to New York.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Nor does it apply to New York.

Mr. KEATING. Of course, New York, like Ohio, I believe, always pays more taxes than it receives from the Federal Government. Many times that has been a source of great concern to the Senators from New York. It is why in connection with all Federal aid projects we must face conflicting considerations, as does the distinguished Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Yes, I understand. I think our States are alike in that respect.

Mr. KEATING. They are alike, except it is worse for New York.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the committee amendments be agreed to en bloc, and that the bill as thus amended be regarded, for purposes of amendment, as original text, and that no point of order shall be considered to have been waived by agreement to this request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The amendments agreed to en bloc are as follows:

On page 3, line 18, after the word "construction", to strike out "$10,895,800" and insert "$13,062,800".

On page 4, at the beginning of line 12, to strike out "$662,622,300" and insert "$737,884,600", and in line 20, after the word "appropriated", to insert a colon and the following additional proviso: "Provided further, That not to exceed $200,000 of the funds herein or hereafter provided for 'Construction, general,' shall be available for the construction of necessary bank stabilization and other protective measures on Red River in the vicinity of the St. Louis Southwestern Railroad and the Arkansas State highway bridges at Garland City, Arkansas".

On page 6, line 18, after "(33 U.S.C. 702a, 702g–1)", to strike out "$4,575,000" and insert "$74,896,000".

On page 8, line 20, after the word "expended", to strike out "$4,575,000" and insert "$5,376,000", and at the beginning of line 21, to strike out "$3,375,000" and insert "$4,426,000".

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the final passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to further amendment.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, the bill received the unanimous approval of the Committee on Appropriations. As is customary, the Subcommittee on Public Works divided itself into three subcommittees for the consideration of the pending bill. The portion of the public works appropriation bill dealing with reclamation and the power-marketing agencies of the Department of the Interior was handled by my good and able friend, the distinguished senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], who is also the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. The portion of the bill covering the Atomic Energy Commission and the Tennessee Valley Authority was handled by my good friend, the distinguished senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL]. I handled the portion of the bill dealing with the civil functions of the Department of the Army.

The hearings on this bill started on February 16 and continued through June 16. The subcommittee held 40 sessions for the purpose of taking testimony, and 5 executive sessions for the purpose of marking up the bill. The subcommittee heard 1,223 witnesses, which included representatives of various organizations; 868 of the witnesses appeared before the subcommittee dealing with civil functions; all but 30 of the remaining witnesses appeared before the subcommittee headed by the Senator from Arizona. The hearings comprise four volumes, which contain 3,642 pages of testimony.

Mr. President, before marking up the civil functions portion of this bill, I reviewed every project that was presented to the subcommittee, budgeted or unbudgeted. I went through every single request made for planning or construction. After all the requests were made, I called the engineers back to obtain their views on the projects presented to the subcommittee. The purpose was to find out whether all the requests which were made by outside witnesses could be handled economically by the Corps of Engineers and whether the corps had the capability to undertake the projects submitted for consideration.

In order to balance the bill, and in order to take care of many worthy areas not previously included in the bill, I recommended to the subcommittee the inclusion of a number of projects that had been requested by witnesses from all over the country, and by Members of both the Senate and the House of Representatives. I hope that the Senate will agree to the recommendations of the Committee on Appropriations and that it will be possible to retain the majority of the projects in the conference with the House.

The House committee added 3 unbudgeted construction projects, 2 resumption of construction projects, and 17 unbudgeted planning items; and increased the amount recommended for planning on 1 project. The House sent us a bill which on its face was under the budget, but in order to attain that goal the House reduced or eliminated funds requested in the budget on 20 items for a total reduction of $51,440,700, including a reduction in the estimate for slippage and savings from $40 million to $60 million. The committee was requested to restore $45,424,000 of the House reduction. During the hearings the Engineers offered reductions in the budget estimates of $6,016,700, which accounts for the difference between the House reduction in the budget and the amount the Senate committee was requested to restore.

In order to present a bill below the budget, the House committee recommended appropriations less than the budget estimate for many of the projects for which the Corps of Engineers has requested restoration. These restorations are part of the increases recommended in the bill now before the Senate. Based on past experience on large construction projects, the Corps of Engineers finds that it is safe to underfinance these projects by about 5 percent. These slippages result, for example, where because of bad weather or for other reasons, a contractor may not be able to do all of the work on schedule.

The House further underfinanced the program by an additional $20 million, which has the effect of reducing all appropriations by a proportionate amount which may average about 3 percent. Of course, that is in addition to the 5 percent underfinancing provided in the budget recommendations.

The House committee provided for three new construction starts which involve a future commitment of $10,690,000. The 34 additional new construction starts recommended by the Senate involve a future commitment of $523,312,000. The bill as reported to the Senate, therefore, represents a future commitment above the budget recommendation of $534,002,000. This amount is less than the amount recommended by the President for construction for fiscal year 1961 and is about 1 year's construction program.

Except for the fact that for the past several years the Congress has added un-budgeted new starts, the construction program of the Corps of Engineers would have dried up.

Considering the present active program of the Corps of Engineers, the budget estimate provides for the completion of 48 projects, for the initiation of 26 new construction starts, and 7 reimbursements to local interests. The future commitment of the projects recommended in the bill, I repeat, is therefore, about 1 year's construction at the rate recommended in the budget. The bill as reported by the House would contemplate a material reduction in the number of continuing projects which would carry over into fiscal year 1962, at a time when the tempo of the water resource program should be accelerated to meet the water requirements of the 1975–80 period.

Last year when the committee recommended an accelerated program of water resources, it had an estimate from the Department of Commerce which predicted a population of 216 million by 1975. The Department's current estimate is for a population of 230 million by 1980 and of about 226 million in 1975. The Department's current estimate of the water requirement of the United States is 322.9 billion gallons per day for 1960, 449.7 billion gallons per day for 1975, and 494.1 billion gallons per day by 1980. These predictions are based on the assumption that increased productivity per man-hour will be partially balanced by fewer working hours per week; that a larger part of the increased productivity per man-hour will be accomplished by automation, which will increase unit requirements for electric power and water; and that many new products will be produced which are more water demanding. This upward trend in water requirements, however, will be largely balanced by a growing practice of recirculation and reuse and an increased use of brackish water, which will reduce fresh water requirements.

The estimates of the Department of Commerce are definitely conservative, and any revision of the estimates undoubtedly would be upward. It is apparent, therefore, that with respect to water resource projects it is no longer a question of, Can we afford them? It is a question of, Can we afford to delay any longer an increase in the rate of construction to meet the known requirements of the next 15 to 20 years?

The pending bill is a fair bill that deserves the support of the Senate and of the Congress.

Mr. President, at this time I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a list showing the new construction starts added by the Senate under "Construction, general." I wish to say that the total future commitment added by the Senate for these projects is $473,889,000. One project, the Lower Monumental lock and dam, in the State of Washington, accounts for $145,415,000 of that amount. We shall try to get the House to agree to accept this most important project.

There are two or three other projects which account for the major portion of the future commitment recommended by the Senate committee. For instance, there are the Belleville locks and dam, Ohio and West Virginia. The committee in previous years have recommended funds to start quite a few locks and dams along the Ohio River. Some of those projects have advanced to the point where we have improved the navigation prospects of the Ohio River greatly. I am very hopeful that we can now start building some locks on the Monongahela River, which will improve transportation to many parts of West Virginia, Pennsylvania, and the States along the Ohio River.

Another project which we added was the Fishtrap Reservoir in Kentucky; this is a very important project. This project accounts for over $40 million, of the $473,889,000 to which I referred a moment ago.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point a tabulation showing the amounts recommended by the committee for construction, whether budgeted or unbudgeted, the amount allowed by the House and the budget estimate for each project under "Construction, general"; flood control, Mississippi River and tributaries; construction and rehabilitation, Department of the Interior, Bureau of Reclamation; the loan program; and Upper Colorado River Basin fund.

Mr. President, the bill as reported to the Senate amounts to $4,030,010,605. It exceeds the budget estimates by $25,869,425, and exceeds the amount recommended by the House by $115,211,620.

Mr. President, when the budget estimate was sent to the Congress by the President, the omnibus bill had not been passed, and consequently recommendations for funds for many worthy projects in that bill were not presented to him. I feel confident that many of the projects which have been considered by the committee and which have been recommended to the Senate would no doubt have been included in the original estimates of the President, if they had been presented. As I said, including all the additions made by both the House and Senate, the bill as a whole exceeds the budget estimates by only $25,869,425.

There being no objection, the tabulation was ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I have concluded my statement. If there are any questions any Senators would like to ask, I shall be glad to attempt to answer them.

Mr. DOUGLAS and Mr. SCHOEPPEL addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Moss in the chair). Does the Senator from Louisiana yield; and, if so, to whom?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield first to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I wonder if my good friend from Louisiana will permit me at this time to offer an amendment?

Mr. ELLENDER. That is in order, Mr. President.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I offer an amendment and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 4, line 20, after the colon, it is proposed to insert:

Provided further, That of the funds herein made available for the Illinois Waterway Calumet-Sag Channel, not to exceed $900,000 shall be available for the Western Avenue Highway Bridge.

Mr. ELLENDER. I will say to the Senator that at the time the bill was marked up I was under a misapprehension as to exactly what was proposed in the budget estimate. The Senate will recall that last year the Corps of Engineers requested funds in the budget for reconstruction of the Western Avenue Highway Bridge, and stressed the urgency of proceeding with the relocation of the highway bridge prior to the relocation of the Chicago, Rock Island, and Pacific Railroad Bridge because of the difficulties involved in detouring the large volume of highway traffic.

When the committee restored the budget estimate for the Illinois Waterway project, I was under the impression that the Western Avenue Highway Bridge relocation was being provided for. I now find that in view of the action of the conferees last year in deleting funds for the Western Avenue Highway Bridge relocation, the Corps of Engineers did not request funds for this work in fiscal year 1961.

Since the relocation of this bridge is urgently needed, is authorized by law, and the Corps of Engineers is ready to proceed, I will accept the Senator's amendment and take it to conference, inasmuch as it would not increase the amount recommended by the committee but is in the nature of a clarification of work which can be undertaken with the funds made available.

This action is consistent with the Senate committee's recommendation last year, which was concurred in by the Senate.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I thank my good friend from Louisiana for his willingness to accept the amendment.

As the Senator says, the amendment would not increase the total appropriation by a single dollar, but would merely earmark $900,000 of the existing appropriation of $9½ million for this specific purpose.

It would do so for a bridge which has already been authorized by the Congress, an appropriation for which was also recommended by the committee last year. It is in accordance with the 1952 amendment to the Truman-Hobbs Act, which permitted the sharing of costs on local highway bridges as well as on railroad bridges. It is also in line with the specific authorization of the highway bridges over this project in the Rivers and Harbors Act of 1958.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a statement which I have prepared dealing with this matter be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR PAUL H. DOUGLAS IN SUPPORT OF AMENDMENT TO H.R. 12326 TO PROVIDE $900,000 FOR CONSTRUCTION OF THE WESTERN AVENUE HIGHWAY BRIDGE AS PART OF THE ILLINOIS WATERWAY CAL-SAG CHANNEL PROJECT

The purpose of this amendment is to permit the commencement of construction of the Western Avenue Highway Bridge, an essential and authorized part of the Illinois Waterway Cal-Sag Channel project.

The amendment has been drafted so that it does not increase the total appropriation recommended by the committee. It merely permits not to exceed $900,000 to be expended for this highway bridge out of the total figure of $9,500,000 appropriated by this bill for the continuing work on the Cal-Sag project. The total figure for this project is thus left also within the budget estimate.

As members will recall, this Cal-Sag Channel is a key link in the connection between the Great Lakes and the Illinois-Mississippi River Waterway system. The rebuilding of the existing railroad and highway bridges, which obstruct the channel's clearances, is essential to the full realization of the project's benefits. The controversy over and deferment of the highway bridges is the main reason for delays in the scheduled completion of this project.

This amendment would help to resolve that controversy and enable the construction of the principal highway bridge over this channel to proceed as previously authorized by Congress.

REAL ISSUE: ALLOCATION OF COSTS OF HIGHWAY BRIDGES ALTERATION

I want frankly to acknowledge that there has been a sharp controversy over the question of how the costs of relocating these highway bridges should be borne. Last year and again this year a majority of the House Appropriations Committee were of the opinion that local interests, and not the Federal Government, should pay fully for these highway bridge relocations. But for the reasons I shall outline briefly, I hope the Senate will approve this amendment which under the Truman-Hobbs Act as amended and a later specific authorization by Congress, calls for the Federal Government to bear the main share of these bridge costs, and I hope the House on further review will also see the equity of this decision.

1952 AMENDMENT AUTHORIZED LARGER FEDERAL ALLOCATION

1. In 1952 the Truman-Hobbs Act was amended (Public Law 564) to provide for the same apportionment of the costs of altering highway bridges in connection with navigation projects as had previously been authorized under that law for railroad bridges.

This would seem to have resolved the question, but for the fact that the Cal-Sag project had been authorized in 1946, 6 years before.

BOARD OF ENGINEERS RECOMMENDED 1952 AMENDMENT BE APPLIED TO CAL-SAG PROJECT

2. In response to a resolution adopted March 30, 1955, by the House Public Works Committee, therefore, the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors reviewed this precise question as to the proper and equitable extent of local cooperation in bearing the costs of the highway bridges on the Cal-Sag project. After extensive study, the Board and the Chief of Engineers in late 1956 approved a recommendation of the district engineer that—

"In view of the predominantly general nature of the benefits accruing from the project and of the major local contributions toward the development of the project * * * it is considered equitable that the allocation of cost of highway bridge alterations be made in accordance with the provisions of section 6 of Public Law 647, 76th Congress (Truman-Hobbs Act), as amended, in a similar manner to that authorized for railroad bridges" (p. 22, H. Doc. No. 45, 85th Cong.).

In the report preceding this conclusion, past expenditures by local interests for related navigation improvements ($87,500,000), for constructing some highway bridges to provide project clearances ($3,503,000), for lands, easements, and rights of way, for relocation of utilities, etc., were acknowledged.

The rapid increase in volume of barge traffic from 43,000 tons in 1935 to 3,762,000 tons in 1954 was also noted. (The Engineers testified early this year, 1960, that it had risen to 6 million tons in 1958.) The conclusion from that and many other factors there set forth was that "the benefits resulting from the estimated transportation savings will accrue largely to a widespread area and are considered national in scope" (p. 21).

BUREAU OF THE BUDGET CONCURRED

The Bureau of the Budget in December 1956, also approved of these recommendations, that the highway bridge costs on this project be allocated in accord with the Truman-Hobbs Act, as amended.

HOUSE AND SENATE PUBLIC WORKS COMMITTEES APPROVED APPLICATION OF NEW HIGHWAY BRIDGE POLICY TO THIS PROJECT

3. In 1958, the House Committee on Public Works reviewed this same question carefully and came to the same conclusion that the cost-sharing provision of the Truman-Hobbs Act, as amended in 1952, should be applied to this project. (Part I of the project being the only part on which construction was begun, the committee acted only as to it. It said (H. Rept. No. 1894, 85th Cong., p. 70):

"The committee recognizes the importance of the Cal-Sag navigation project as a vital link for through commerce between the Great Lakes and the Mississippi-Ohio Inland Waterway system. It considers that modification of part I to accomplish that portion of the waterway for which funds have been appropriated should be made, and recommends that the highway bridge cost of $9,884,000 in part I of the improvement be borne by the Federal Government" (H. Doc. No. 45, 85th Cong.).

The Senate Committee on Public Works came to the same conclusion. (See S. Rept. No. 1710, 85th Cong., p. 70.)

CONGRESS IN 1958 EXPRESSLY APPLIED NEW POLICY TO THIS PROJECT'S HIGHWAY BRIDGE RELOCATIONS

4. Thereafter in the Rivers and Harbors Act of 1958, Congress passed and the President signed legislation (Public Law 85-500) which expressly provided that the Cal-Sag project should be modified to authorize the recommended allocation of the highway bridge costs. It provided in section 109:

"SEC. 109. The projects for the Illinois Waterway and General Calumet River, Illinois and Indiana (Calumet-Sag navigation project) authorized by the Rivers and Harbors Act of July 24, 1946, is hereby modified in accordance with the recommendations in House Document Numbered 45, Eighty-fifth Congress, insofar as they apply to existing highway bridges in Part I, Sag Junction to Lake Calumet, at an estimated additional cost of $9,884,000."

By the general action of Congress in 1952, covering highway bridges as well as railroad bridges which must be altered because of navigation projects, and by its action on Part I of this specific Cal-Sag project in 1958, surely the congressional authorization for this Federal expenditure is firm and clear.

BUREAU OF BUDGET RECOMMENDED THIS BRIDGE APPROPRIATION IN 1959

5. Acting on this authorization, the Bureau of the Budget and Corps of Engineers in 1959 submitted a proposed appropriation of $930,000 for the Western Avenue Highway Bridge as a part of the new funds requested for the Cal-Sag project.

But the House Appropriations Committee in 1959 struck this $930,000 item. The Senate committee reinserted it, but it was then dropped in conference. And in 1960, the House committee cut out even the $2 million proposed appropriation for railroad bridge relocations because with the highway bridge problem unresolved, the project benefits could not be fully realized.

The Senate Appropriations Committee, however, has wisely restored this $2 million to the Cal-Sag appropriation in the bill now before us, but it did not act on the highway bridge issue which my amendment raises.

HOUSE APPROPRIATIONS COMMITTEE'S REASONS FOR OPPOSING APPROPRIATION

6. Why then should this Cal-Sag project be denied the benefits of the revised Federal policy on highway bridges?

The House Appropriations Committee based its denial on the grounds that Federal assumption of the main highway bridge costs (a) would relieve local interests of a once-committed contribution, (b) would be a retroactive application of the 1952 policy to a project originally authorized in 1946, and (c) would establish a precedent which would lead to parallel claims for greater Federal contributions on other projects.

ANSWERS TO HOUSE COMMITTEE'S OBJECTIONS

(a) There are two answers to the argument about a prior commitment. First, the district engineer in his report of 1955 (prior to the specific modification of the project in 1958) on the question of local cooperation as required under the authorizing law reported (p. 11, H. Doc. No. 45, 85th Cong.):

"Specific pledges have been received for the requisite items, subject to the qualification that the cost of highway bridge alterations would be borne by local interests only to the extent required by applicable Federal law at the time the bridges are reconstructed."

Second, even if assurances had been given in 1946, the benefit of the change of general Federal policy by the Truman-Hobbs Act amendment of 1952 should not be denied in connection with future construction, at least where the legislation itself did not exclude such application. In 1952, Congress recognized that the owners of highway bridges—mostly public bodies—which had to be altered for navigation projects were just as much entitled to consideration as the railroad companies whose bridge alteration costs were covered in the original Truman-Hobbs Act. It did not state that the resulting benefits should be denied in all cases where projects were previously authorized, but not yet started. And after Congress had acted on this specific Cal-Sag project in 1958, the argument for retaining and enforcing the 1946 conditions seems to me groundless. The Senate Appropriations Committee recognized these two points in its report on the 1959 bill, Senate Report No. 486, 86th Congress, page 23.

(b) True retroactivity would be invoked if the local interests sought to recoup the costs of highway bridges over the Cal-Sag Channel which they have already relocated and modified at their own expense ($3,503,000). But that is not requested. The local interests, the Board of Engineers and the Bureau of the Budget have only recommended (and this is the recommendation Congress approved in 1958) that the policy apply prospectively, to highway bridges thereafter relocated.

(c) The action proposed by my amendment is a precedent only to the extent that other projects can show the same factors of highway bridges not yet relocated, of important and widespread national benefits from completion of the project, and of major local contributions (substantially over $90 million—which actually exceeds the total estimated Federal cost for part I of this project) already made for related features of this project.

To the extent that other projects reveal the same factors, I would think them entitled to the same treatment. But there will be few.

CHIEF OF ENGINEERS FINDS NO DANGEROUS PRECEDENT

The Chief of Engineers, Lt. Gen. E. C. Itschner, has spoken directly and authoritatively to this point in his letter of May 17, 1960, to Hon. MICHAEL J. KIRWAN to obtain which I secured the gracious consent of Representative KIRWAN and the Office of the Chief. It summarizes so well the case for applying the Truman-Hobbs Act policy to this project—as Congress has previously authorized—and answers so well the doubts raised by the House committee, that I quote from that letter in full:

MAY 17, 1960.

Hon. MICHAEL J. KIRWAN,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. KIRWAN: In compliance with oral request to me yesterday from Mr. Joseph R. Brennan, engineer-consultant, House Committee on Public Works, this is to confirm that I still believe to be sound the provisions of the 1958 River and Harbor Act modifying the Cal-Sag project by apportioning the costs of altering highway bridges between the United States and the bridge owners, rather than requiring bridge owners or local interests to bear the entire cost as in the previous project.

The previous project provided for apportionment of the costs of altering railroad bridges but not highway bridges because at that time the Truman-Hobbs Act applied only to railroad bridges. Enactment of Public Law 564, 82d Congress, which extended the provisions of the Truman-Hobbs Act to publicly owned highway bridges, indicated a change in congressional policy; and, in equity highway bridges deserved the same treatment accorded railroad bridges under the previous project authorization.

I do not believe the precedent established in the Cal-Sag case has any unusual significance or wide application because I can think of no project comparable to the Cal-Sag project in magnitude or complexity as to bridge alteration. I may add that it is not our thinking that the Truman-Hobbs Act should apply retrocatively to any and all projects that may involve bridge alterations. It is very possible that alteration costs in a particular project, because of the local nature and benefits, might still be found properly a matter of local cooperation. In the Cal-Sag case, because the project was of national scope, the benefits widespread and general in nature, the project itself would attract a large volume of heavy truck traffic, and because local interests had already spent large sums for features of work, it was judged reasonable and equitable that the principles of the Truman-Hobbs Act, as amended, should be applied. You may be assured that each case will be considered on its merits and every case will be reviewed by the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, the Office of the Chief of Engineers, the Bureau of the Budget, and congressional committees.

Funds were requested in the fiscal year 1960 budget to initiate construction on Western Avenue Highway Bridge. These funds were not provided due to the action of the House Committee on Appropriations. In view of the comments in the House committee report on the 1960 budget request, the Corps of Engineers did not renew its request for highway bridge funds for fiscal year 1961.

I trust the foregoing meets your needs and any additional information you may require will be furnished gladly at your request.

Sincerely yours,

E. C. ITSCHNER,
Lieutenant General, U.S. Army, Chief of Engineers.

The Chief of Engineers thus reaffirms his belief in the wisdom and equity of proceeding with the highway bridges, which is what my amendment will initiate.

For all these reasons, therefore, and to prevent the further delays on project completion that will result from holding up the highway bridge relocations, I hope the Senate will approve my amendment. And in the event this amendment is adopted, I would further urge my friends and colleagues on the House Appropriations Committee, for whose conscientious devotion to duty I have the greatest respect, to review this matter again, in the light of the facts I have tried to point out, and see if they can now agree that the benefits of the revised Federal policy on highway bridges should be made available through appropriations to this vital link in our Federal waterway system.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I also express the hope that my good friend from Louisiana will do his best to have this amendment agreed to by the House members of the conference committee. The difficulty has not been with the Senate committee, but with the House committee on this matter. I hope the Senate conferees will take a very resolute attitude and will stand for this principle. I hope they will convince the reluctant House Members.

Mr. ELLENDER. I assure the Senator, as the chairman-to-be of the conference committee, that I shall do all I can to have the item included in the bill as finally passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. President, I desire to express my appreciation to the able and distinguished chairman of the Senate committee and to all of those associated with him for their helpful and constructive action in respect to several Alaskan projects. The Senate committee added money for small boat harbors at Douglas, at Juneau, at Homer, and at Ninilchik. It is my hope that the Senate will sustain the action of its committee, and that the conferees will agree on the need for these small boat harbors because they are essential to the important fishing industry of Alaska.

I desire to call attention especially to the proposed small boat harbor for Homer, which was requested in the budget. The funds requested for that project, somewhat in excess of $500,000, were not allowed by the House committee or by the House because of a mistaken belief that there was a controversy existing as to the location of the harbor. Actually that was not the case. There was unanimity on that point. So I would expect that project to be accepted with very little question.

I trust, too, that all the other projects which I have named will be included in the bill as it is finally passed.

I desire to speak especially about the action of the Senate committee in increasing from $100,000, which was the amount requested in the budget, to $350,000, funds for the study of the Rampart hydroelectric project in central Alaska.

There is no power potential in the entire United States having the magnitude of Rampart. It would, upon completion, have an installed capacity of 4,760,000 kilowatts. It would furnish electricity, we hope for as little as two mills, and thus would attract large scale industry. The faster the study is made, the sooner we will know just what we have there, and the action of the committee in this regard is most helpful. If Rampart is to be built, a lake larger than Lake Erie will be created. It is a proposition that challenges the imagination and the vision of the American people. Rampart would be about two and a half times as big as Grand Coulee, the largest existing hydroelectric project in the United States.

Once more I wish to thank the Senator from Louisiana and the members of his subcommittee for having taken into account the needs of Alaska and having acted so affirmatively on them.

Mr. ELLENDER. I thank the Senator for his remarks.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. I thank the Senator from Louisiana for yielding briefly to permit me to make an observation.

First, I wish to express my gratitude to the Senator from Louisiana and the other members of the committee for the consideration which they have given to projects located in our State of Kansas. I am especially appreciative of the fact that the committee has restored part of the funds which the House deleted from the budget request for the Milford project, which is an important flood control project in our State.

However, I wish to say that I am somewhat deeply disappointed that the committee has not provided funds for the Elk City project. About 20 years ago the Congress authorized the construction of four dams to be located on the Verdigris River and its tributaries. This river flows through one of our most fertile and productive areas of our State. To date two of these projects have been completed. The Fall River Dam was dedicated in 1949, the year I came to the Senate of the United States. I was privileged to be called upon to speak at the dedication of the Toronto Dam on June 18 of that year.

We had high hopes, of course, that this year Congress would appropriate funds so that we could begin construction of the Elk City project. On pages 11 and 12 of the report there are listed all of the Kansas projects.

If my memory serves me correctly, the Congress allowed $100,000 in 1944 for planning purposes and an additional $75,000 in 1947. Since that time the Budget Bureau has not deemed it advisable to recommend funds for the construction of the Elk City project, notwithstanding the fact that the cost-benefit ratio on this project is very favorable.

For the past several years I have gone before the Appropriations Committees and requested that funds be appropriated for this important project, as has my colleague, Senator CARLSON. Recognizing the importance of this project, I am pleased to say that it was by reason of the efforts of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER] and other members of his subcommittee in 1959, and again in 1960, that the Appropriations Committee added $1 million for this project, but on each occasion the item was lost in conference.

I have prepared an amendment. However, I will say very frankly that after discussing the subject with the distinguished Senator from Louisiana, who, with the other members of his subcommittee, has done such a fine job on this bill, I shall not offer it because I understand it is the will and desire to hold these projects in line with what has been suggested by the distinguished chairman.

I do understand, and I am hopeful, that we shall have an opportunity in connection with a supplemental appropriation to present matters such as this. I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from Louisiana if that is the case.

Mr. ELLENDER. Let me say to my good friend from Kansas that if he will count the number of projects provided for in the bill for Kansas, they aggregate 14, of which 5 are new projects. There are many that could have been included, but in order to have a balanced bill, we could not afford to include every project that Kansas desires. What we did was to include the ones with the highest ratio of cost to benefit and in that way we took care of the five unbudgeted items recommended.

It is my understanding that there will be a new title added to the mutual security bill for the supplemental requests that may be made by the White House. There are also some, I think, that were left over from the supplemental bill that we considered during the closing days of the session before the conventions. It is my purpose to consider certain projects that may be requested, that is, to conduct the usual hearings, and then to call in the Engineers to find out whether or not they have the capability to work on these projects.

The reason I am inclined to do that—and I think the committee will be agreeable to it—is that since Congress recessed in early July the omnibus bill was signed. There are quite a few projects included in the omnibus bill that should receive the attention of the Congress before adjournment. Having that in mind, I shall gladly consider testimony as to such projects in the omnibus bill as Senators or others may desire to submit.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. I wish to express my appreciation to the Senator from Louisiana. I shall expect that course to be followed. The Senator will recall, of course, that the committee was good enough to include the Elk City project twice, but we lost the project in conference with the House.

Mr. ELLENDER. That is correct.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. I am sure that is one of the reasons why, together with what the Senator has mentioned, he and the members of the subcommittee thought it advisable to leave it out on this occasion; and we shall proceed along the lines suggested.

I again wish to express my appreciation to the Senator and to the members of his subcommitte for the consideration given to the State of Kansas.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, I would like to take this opportunity to thank the distinguished Senator from Louisiana, Senator ELLENDER, and the Appropriations Committee for the consideration given my State of West Virginia regarding Public Works projects appropriations for the fiscal year, 1961.

The appropriations earmarked for West Virginia will enable my State to progress further in flood control. Four hundred and four thousand dollars has been approved for construction of a flood control project at East Rainelle, $500,000 for the Opekiska lock and dam near Fairmont, $350,000 for a flood control project at Princeton, and $300,000 for construction at Williamson.

Four million four hundred thousand dollars is included for construction of the Summersville Reservoir, and $500,000 for construction and $250,000 for planning in connection with Belleville locks and dams. Additionally, $6,180,000 is included for construction of the New Cumberland locks and dam. I look upon these appropriations as a worthwhile investment in the future welfare of the country and the people.

The myriad of benefits which accrue from such projects is great. Not only do such projects create jobs, but they also alleviate expensive results of flooding, and serve to preserve the natural assets to be found in the Nation's water supply.

The ultimate control of rivers and streams which presently run unharnessed will enable utilization of lands which, without flood control, are inundated from time to time. This consequently, will mean more available sites for industrial and agricultural development.

My colleague, Senator RANDOLPH, and I have been very interested in the items I have mentioned, and, speaking as a representative of the citizens of West Virginia, and as a member of the Senate Appropriations Committee, I would like to express gratitude to Senator ELLENDER who, as chairman of the Public Works Subcommittee, has shown farsightedness in his awareness of the needs to improve this country's natural water supply.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, I think a little history on the development of the project for the installation of reactors at our bases in the Antarctic for which this bill provides $13 million, is in order to illustrate a serious deficiency in our budgeting process against which we must continually guard. This deficiency is one which results in increased costs to the Government.

Over a year ago the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy foresaw possible economic advantages in the use of nuclear reactors to supply energy requirements at our remote Government sites by reducing the very costly operation of supplying diesel fuel to these sites. Accordingly, last year, the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy recommended, and the Congress authorized, a study to obtain up-to-date information on the economic potentials of such applications of nuclear power.

The results of this study, which we received earlier this year, were printed in the Joint Committee hearings on the Atomic Energy Commission's authorization bill, and indicated that there were major economic advantages in the use of nuclear reactors at our remote sites, particularly at our scientific stations in the Antarctic. Accordingly, the Joint Committee added to the Atomic Energy Commission's authorization bill, as submitted to the Congress by the administration, a project authorizing $13 million for the construction of power reactor plants in the Antarctic.

Although the testimony the Joint Committee received clearly indicated the major economic advantages which would accrue to the Government by the use of nuclear reactors in the Antarctic and the reduced risk to human life which would result by the elimination of the very hazardous fuel transportation operation in the Antarctic, the Bureau of the Budget, incomprehensible as it may seem, did not include the project in its request to the Congress for authorization or appropriations.

Although the Congress authorized the Antarctic reactor project earlier this year, the administration took no positive action to carry out this valuable project. By letter dated May 17, 1960, the Bureau of the Budget informed the Joint Committee that the Department of Defense was being asked to review the advantages of nuclear reactors in the Antarctic. This review was being initiated in spite of the fact that a very comprehensive study had just been completed which clearly indicated the advantages of the project.

The Joint Committee foresaw the possibility of another serious delay in this project and directed, on June 14, 1960, letters to the Department of Defense, the Atomic Energy Commission and the Bureau of the Budget requesting immediate action to carry out the project. In our letter to the Bureau of the Budget we expressed our concern with the lack of initiative and responsibility shown by the Bureau of the Budget in regard to this project.

Finally, on July 19, 1960, the Joint Committee was sent a copy of the Secretary of Defense's letter to the Bureau of the Budget which reported on the review the Bureau of the Budget asked the Department of Defense to make. The review, of course, corroborated the data submitted earlier this year to the Joint Committee by the Atomic Energy Commission.

We still have not received a reply to our June 14, 1960, letter to the Bureau of the Budget although we were informed today by the Atomic Energy Commission that a contractor has been selected to furnish one of the required reactors authorized for the Antarctic. We hope that this action will shortly be followed by the initiation of procurements for the other reactors required in the Antarctic.

The sequence of events on this project illustrates the importance of continually monitoring the budgeting operations of the Government to assure that maximum economies in Government operations are realized.

I would like to place in the RECORD the correspondence I referred to above. In addition, I would like to place in the RECORD a news release issued today by Senator JACKSON on the subject. Senator JACKSON visited the Antarctic and was one of the first to recognize the major advantages of this project. I ask unanimous consent that the correspondence and news releases be included in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. ATOMIC ENERGY COMMISSION,
August 10, 1960.

Hon. CLINTON P. ANDERSON,
Chairman, Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, Congress of the United States.

DEAR SENATOR ANDERSON: Please refer to my letter of June 20, 1960, regarding invitations for proposals on the McMurdo Sound nuclear powerplant subject.

Proposals were received on July 18, 1960, from Alco Products, Inc., Combustion Engineering, Inc., and the Martin Co.

This is to advise you that the proposal submitted by the Martin Co. has been selected as a basis for negotiation of a fixed-price contract for a pressurized water type reactor to be constructed at McMurdo Sound. The contract price for the plant and two cores is not to exceed $3,950,678. In addition, the contract includes options for identical plants at McMurdo Sound.

The Commission's schedule calls for the reactor to be delivered to a naval port of embarkation by November 1, 1961, and for commencement of the plant availability test 75 days after the plant is delivered by the Navy to the construction site.

The tight schedule under which this program must be carried out, if we are not to lose a full year, makes it necessary for us to enter into a contract for this project prior to the enactment of the AEC appropriations bill. We have, therefore, made arrangements under which the Department of the Navy has transferred to us $1,500,000 to initiate this work with the understanding that funds expected to be included in the AEC or Navy 1961 appropriations for this purpose will eventually be used. Pending the availability of these funds, any contract which is signed with the Martin Co. will have a ceiling of $1.5 million.

Attached is a copy of the proposed public announcement concerning this award.

Sincerely yours,

A. R. LUEDECKE,
General Manager.

PUBLIC ANNOUNCEMENT: THE MARTIN CO. TO SUPPLY REACTOR FOR MCMURDO SOUND

The Atomic Energy Commission has selected, as a basis for contract negotiations, a proposal of the Martin Co., Baltimore, Md., to supply a packaged nuclear powerplant for McMurdo Sound in Antarctica at a fixed price of not more than $3,950,678. This is the first of several plants which Congress authorized for installation in the Antarctic.

The proposal of the Martin Co. for this project was one of three submitted in response to a Commission invitation issued last June. Proposals were also received from Combustion Engineering, Inc., New York, N.Y., and Alco Products, Inc., Schenectady, N.Y.

Under the terms of the contract, the Martin Co. will design a 1,500-electric-kilowatt reactor and fabricate, assemble, and test operate the plant at McMurdo Sound. The reactor will be a pressurized water type, moderated and cooled with light water. It will be assembled at the factory in packages and shipped to the site for erection.

In selecting the contractor, the Commission has taken cognizance of the provisions of the Antarctic Treaty now pending ratification which relate to radioactive waste from reactor plants. The plant will be so designed and operated that radioactive waste will be handled in conformity with the terms of the treaty.

The contract requires that the reactor, designated PM–3A, shall be tested and be ready for shipment on November 1, 1961, and be in operation by early 1962. This schedule makes possible the use of the maximum time available for construction during the short Antarctic summer season.

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,
Washington, D.C., July 19, 1960.

Hon. CLINTON P. ANDERSON,
Chairman, Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, Congress of the United States.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: By letter dated May 17, 1960, the Director, Bureau of the Budget, informed the Secretary of Defense of the Bureau's position on funding for nuclear-powered reactors for Antarctica and requested that the Department of Defense review the advantages of nuclear power at bases there. I understand that a copy of this letter was provided to the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy. I am forwarding a copy of a letter dated July 11, 1960, from the Deputy Secretary of Defense to the Director, Bureau of the Budget, in answer to the above letter, which, I believe, will provide the Department of Defense position on this matter in answer to the joint letter from you, Senator JACKSON and Congressman HOLIFIELD dated June 14, 1960.

Subject to the final approval of a specific appropriation for the powerplants in Antarctica, the Department of Defense will continue to assist the Atomic Energy Commission in their effort to get the construction of the first increment of the McMurdo plant under way in sufficient time to meet the November 1961 delivery date.

Sincerely yours,

HERBERT B. LOPER,
Assistant to the Secretary of Defense (Atomic Energy).

THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,
Washington, D.C., July 11, 1960.

HON. MAURICE STANS,
Director, Bureau of the Budget.

DEAR MR. STANS: In your letter of May 17, 1960, you requested the Department of Defense to review the advantages of nuclear power in Antarctica, taking into account the anticipated level of scientific and logistic activities. Our review clearly indicates that the use of nuclear power in the Antarctic would substantially improve the quality of the logistic support afforded to the scientific work in that area.

The primary purpose of the effort in the Antarctic is a scientific endeavor. The Department of Defense, by direction of the President, is contributing logistic support. Because of the enormous distances involved, transporting, supplying, and quartering scientific personnel, and their necessary support forces are costing the Defense Department many times the amount actually spent on the scientific effort itself. Long lead times and the difficulty of predicting scientific needs make it highly desirable to rebuild the supporting bases in such a manner as to provide the flexibility required to meet the demands of the scientific effort.

There are only 3 to 4 months during the year when supply and construction work can be conducted in Antarctica. This season is from November through February. Generally major construction requires two seasons, one for site preparation simultaneously with procurement of building material in the United States, and the second for actual construction. Therefore, planning, programing and budgeting must be completed 2 to 3 years prior to the date the project can be put to use.

The operations in the Antarctic are split into two phases: the winter and summer operations. During the summer, resupply is achieved; Seabees and construction personnel are brought in for necessary construction repairs and rehabilitation of the base sites; and an air group is based at McMurdo Sound to conduct logistic flights to the Byrd, South Pole, and other stations. In fiscal year 1962 it is estimated that 750 personnel will be based ashore in the Antarctic during the summer period. Only the scientific observers and a minimum number of Navy support personnel remain on the ice during the Antarctic winter. In fiscal year 1962 it is estimated that 150 persons will be in the Antarctic during the winter period. Thus at all stations it is necessary to provide adequate facilities for the maximum numbers anticipated during the summer seasons as well as permanent facilities for those persons who remain in the Antarctic for the long winter season.

In reviewing the present and anticipated level of scientific and logistic efforts in the Antarctic, it was mutually agreed by representatives of both the National Science Foundation and the Department of Defense that there was a most definite and urgent need for improvement in all facilities at the various U.S. Antarctic stations. The original concept of the design and construction at the old IGY stations was based on a temporary installation, to be used 2 years at the most. The facilities are now 5 years old and must be replaced. In most instances it is much more economical to construct improved facilities rather than to attempt to rehabilitate the old facilities. For example, the present buildings are heated with oil stoves. Fire will always be a tremendous hazard so long as oil-fired space heaters are used; and, owing to the lack of water, firefighting is extremely difficult. Should a barracks building or food storage cache be destroyed by fire during the winter months, the personnel would face a critical problem of survival until help could reach them during the short operating season. In addition, buildings which are tightly closed or located in snow tunnels present a serious personnel hazard from toxic gases escaping from oil-fired heaters.

Nuclear power would permit the electrification of all heating and cooking facilities. It would provide ample power for increased scientific effort, and marked improvements in communications, aircraft operations, and general living conditions to attract more of the top scientific personnel to the work in that area.

The proposed program for installation of nuclear power in the Antarctic provides for plants at McMurdo Sound, the Byrd and South Pole stations. McMurdo Sound is the main base of support operations in the Antarctic. Shiploads of supplies are received here each year. Here the U.S. Navy operates an air facility to support air cargo lift to outlying stations. Here the first nuclear powerplant, a 1,500 kilowatt plant, mounted on piling foundations, would be installed in late 1961. The second nuclear powerplant, an 800–1,000 kilowatt unit, would be installed at Byrd station in 1962. It would be assembled in a snow tunnel similar to that being used by the U.S. Army at Camp Century, Greenland, this summer. In 1963, the third plant would be installed at the South Pole using the same type of nuclear powerplant as used at the Byrd station. The experience gained by the Seabees in installing plants at McMurdo Sound and Byrd station would be essential for the task at the South Pole. In 1964, the second nuclear increment of 1,500 kilowatts would be installed at McMurdo Sound. Thus, at the end of four building seasons, three stations could be rehabilitated and completely electrified.

The Antarctic Treaty provides that no radioactive waste shall be disposed of in the Antarctic. Provisions can be made in the design of the nuclear powerplants for the disposal of radioactive wastes outside of the Continent of Antarctica. Spent reactor cores would be returned to the United States. Spent filters and concentrated, low-level wastes could be shipped either to the Conus or to authorized waste-disposal sites.

The possible effect of nuclear reactors on the scientific investigation of existing radiation levels in the Antarctic is a matter for consideration. Continuous monitoring data taken in the vicinity of the nuclear powerplant at Fort Belvoir since November 1955 indicate no increase in normal background activity levels resulting from operation of this plant, even though this plant has been operating since April 1957 with controlled release of extremely minute amounts of activity to the environment. Accordingly, it appears that the operation of nuclear powerplants would not adversely affect scientific investigations in the Antarctic. Each of the proposed nuclear plant projects would, of course, be reviewed for compliance with appropriate safety criteria by the Atomic Energy Commission's reactor hazards staff.

The Congress has expressed a desire to install nuclear power in Antarctica as soon as possible. The Joint Committee on Atomic Energy concluded that atomic powerplants in the Antarctic would result in immediate savings in lives and equipment and monetary savings on the order of $80 million over 20 years. They further noted that such plants would enhance our national prestige by developing the peaceful uses of atomic energy in the Antarctic, where the United States is participating in scientific work with 11 other nations. The installation of nuclear power in the Antarctic would be a dramatic demonstration of the President's "Atoms for Peace" program.

In addition, the report for the plan for the use of nuclear power in Antarctica was approved by the National Security Council on May 4, 1960.

Even though the plants planned for use in the Antarctic will be based upon proven technology, considerable care should be taken to assure that the plant designs properly incorporate this technology, and to assure that the plants are the most advanced that can now be built with assurance of reliability. For this reason, the unique experience and capabilities of the Atomic Energy Commission should be utilized to procure these plants. The Navy would transport, install, and operate the plants.

It is our understanding that the Atomic Energy Commission will receive appropriations for the procurement of the reactors. With respect to the plant at McMurdo, the Navy will reprogram within available resources in fiscal year 1961 to buy the material necessary for the construction and installation of the reactors at this location. Navy support requirements for the other two locations will be considered in connection with the fiscal year 1962 budget.

If funds for this project are appropriated, it is recommended that action be taken without further delay to procure such plants in order to avoid the loss of a full year. Such a delay could cost additional lives, put the installations of the powerplants out of phase with the rebuilding program, and could nullify the prestige which the United States stands to gain through such a scientific and engineering effort.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES H. DOUGLAS, Deputy.

U.S. ATOMIC ENERGY COMMISSION,
Washington, D.C., June 20, 1959.

HON. CLINTON P. ANDERSON,
Chairman, Joint Committee on Atomic Energy.

DEAR SENATOR ANDERSON: With reference to the letter of June 14, 1960, from you, Senator JACKSON, and Representative HOLIFIELD, I am pleased to advise you that as of this date invitations have been extended for proposals on the McMurdo Sound nuclear powerplant project, it being stipulated that contract award is subject to the availability of funds. The invitations call for options until August 15, 1961, on up to two complementary plants for McMurdo Sound in order that we may ascertain through actual bids the effect of multiple orders on nuclear plant price. In the near future, as soon as appropriate technical specifications have been completed, we will invite proposals for plants for the Byrd and Pole Stations.

Because we must have a contractor at work by August 1 at the very latest, in order to give ourselves every opportunity to meet the November 1, 1961, date for shipment of the plant to the Antarctic, we have invited proposals from only those firms which are known to have a capability for fabricating an appropriate prepackaged plant on what will necessarily be an accelerated basis, and which are known to be interested in the McMurdo Sound project.

Our invitation calls for proposals to be submitted by July 18, and although the time allowed for their preparation is extremely limited, we have reason to believe that we will receive at least several adequate proposals from which to make a selection. We hope to negotiate a fixed-price contract with appropriate performance and schedule guarantees.

As discussed by Mr. Ramey and General Luedecke on June 18, the enclosed public announcement of the invitation for proposals will be released here and in New York on June 21, 1960.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN A. MCCONE,
Chairman.

STATEMENT BY JOINT COMMITTEE MEMBERS ON THE CONSTRUCTION OF A NUCLEAR POWERPLANT IN THE ANTARCTIC

(From the Office of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy)

Three senior members of the Congressional Joint Committee on Atomic Energy expressed gratification today that the Atomic Energy Commission has acceded to their request to solicit proposals for atomic powerplants in the Antarctic on an accelerated schedule, it was announced today by Chairman CLINTON P. ANDERSON. Senator ANDERSON was joined by Senator HENRY M. JACKSON, chairman of the Military Applications Subcommittee, and Representative CHET HOLIFIELD, chairman of the Subcommittee on Legislation. At the same time copies of letters signed on June 14, 1960, by the three members to the AEC, the Defense Department, and the Bureau of the Budget requesting urgent action on the Antarctic projects were released.

"We are pleased," said the three members, "that the Commission is proceeding to obtain proposals for at least one reactor, and hope that others will follow. We hope that the Commission's action is a signal that the executive branch and especially the Budget Bureau has finally decided to break the logjam on these projects."

The letter of the Joint Committee members to the Atomic Energy Commission stated:

"The history of this project (reactor powerplants for the Antarctic) as brought out during our hearings, gives us a classical example of how delays are developed in getting started on an important project. In order to prevent further serious delays it is obvious that positive action, which will contribute directly to progress of the work on this project, must be taken immediately.

"Accordingly, we strongly urge that the Commission proceed with the solicitation of proposals immediately, including in the solicitation the proviso concerning the appropriation of funds discussed above. We are very interested in seeing this important project proceed on schedule since, as testified to in our hearings, we as a Nation stand to profit so greatly from it economically, from the standpoint of international prestige, and from the standpoint of humanitarian considerations."

In a letter to Mr. Stans, Director of the Budget Bureau, the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy members said:

"It is incomprehensible to us that the executive branch has still not formulated definite plans for the project and has not taken any positive action to start work on the plants. We are very much concerned with the lack of initiative and responsibility shown by the Budget Bureau in regard to this project, and with the consequences of the loss of a whole year if responsible action is not taken immediately.

"In any event we urge you to reexamine the plans for this project immediately and take whatever action is necessary to assure that no further delays are incurred in order that the Government can profit to the maximum amount possible from the economies and other benefits which will result."

No reply has as yet been received from Mr. Stans as to the request.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON
ATOMIC ENERGY,
CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
June 14, 1960.

Hon. JOHN A. MCCONE,
Chairman, U.S. Atomic Energy Commission, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. MCCONE: We are concerned with the possibility of incurring a delay in the initiation of procurement action for nuclear plants for the Antarctic which may result in failure to meet the November 1961 plant completion date.

General Luedecke's May 19, 1960, letter stated that the Commission believes the schedule could be met if the invitation for the nuclear plants can be issued in the next couple of weeks. General Luedecke's letter also stated that the Commission has already prepared an invitation for proposals for a reactor for McMurdo Sound. However, it is stated that the invitations are not being sent out because the Commission does not want to ask industry to spend time and money preparing proposals until there is assurance that funds will be made available for the plants.

You will recall that during the hearings on the Commission's fiscal year 1961 authorization bill the subject of proceeding with the solicitation of proposals prior to completion of congressional authorization and appropriate action was discussed (p. 374 of the hearing record). At that time Senator JACKSON asked Commissioner Floberg if it would not be possible to solicit proposals in advance of final congressional action including in the solicitation a stipulation that action on the proposals would be subject to authorization and appropriation of funds by the Congress. Commissioner Floberg stated that he knew of no legal problem in proceeding in this manner.

As you know, the Antarctic projects have since been authorized by the Congress. The appropriation of funds for the projects are now under consideration by the Congress. However, final action may not be taken on the appropriation bill for a couple of weeks.

In consideration of the above there is a serious possibility that this project may be delayed by a year if solicitation of proposals is not made immediately since if the plants are not ready for shipments during the short Antarctic construction period, starting in November, they must wait for the next year.

This impending delay brings to mind the comments you made after your visit to the Soviet Union last year on the need for cutting down the leadtime of our projects. We wholeheartedly agree with you on the need for eliminating this serious and inefficient situation. The history of the project, as brought out during our hearings, gives us a classical example of how delays are developed in getting started on an important project. In order to prevent further serious delays it is obvious that positive action, which will contribute directly to progress of the work on this project, must be taken immediately.

Accordingly, we strongly urge that the Commission proceed with the solicitation of proposals immediately, including in the solicitation the proviso concerning the appropriation of funds discussed above. We are very interested in seeing this important project proceed on schedule since, as testified to in our hearings, we, as a Nation, stand to profit so greatly from it economically, from the standpoint of international prestige and from the standpoint of humanitarian considerations.

Sincerely yours,
CLINTON P. ANDERSON,
Chairman.

Chairman, Military Applications Subcommittee.
CHET HOLIFIELD,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Legislation.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON
ATOMIC ENERGY,
CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
June 14, 1960.

The Honorable THOMAS S. GATES,
The Secretary of Defense, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Attached is a copy of a letter, dated June 14, 1960, which we have sent to the Atomic Energy Commission expressing our concern about delays in getting started on the nuclear reactor plants for the Antarctic and urging the Commission to take steps immediately to obtain proposals for construction of the plants subject to obtaining appropriations.

As you know, a comprehensive study of the use of reactor plants in the Antarctic and other remote sites was made by the Atomic Energy Commission for the Joint Committee. This study was based on information furnished by the Department of Defense and the U.S. Antarctic Projects Office. The study clearly showed the advantages of nuclear power applications at our bases in the Antarctic.

In March and April of this year, extensive hearings were held on the use of reactor plants in the Antarctic. In correspondence from the Department of Defense, and testimony by the Atomic Energy Commission, the Navy, and the U.S. Antarctic Project Office, all concurred in the advantages of this application.

Testimony by the Atomic Energy Commission made it clear that the solicitation of contractors for the plants must proceed immediately if the schedules stated in the March 31, 1960, letter from James H. Douglas, Acting Secretary of Defense, are to be met.

Accordingly, your cooperation is requested in carrying out the action requested of the Atomic Energy Commission in the attached letter. We are seriously concerned with the administrative delays which have already been incurred in initiating positive action to carry out this valuable project and with the imminent possibility of losing a whole year if action is not taken immediately.

Sincerely yours,
CLINTON P. ANDERSON,
Chairman.
HENRY M. JACKSON,
Chairman, Military Applications Subcommittee.
CHET HOLIFIELD,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Legislation.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON
ATOMIC ENERGY,
CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
June 14, 1960.

Hon. MAURICE H. STANS,
Director, Bureau of the Budget, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. STANS: Attached are copies of our letters to the Atomic Energy Commission and the Department of Defense, dated June 14, 1960, urging immediate action on the solicitation of proposals for the construction of Antarctic reactor plants subject to obtaining appropriations.

It is incomprehensible to us that the executive branch has still not formulated definite plans for the project and has not taken any positive action to start work on the plants. We are very much concerned with the lack of initiative and responsibility shown by the Budget Bureau in regard to this project, and with the consequences of the loss of a whole year if responsible action is not taken immediately.

Our Senate Members are taking steps with Senate Appropriations Committee to enable funds appropriated to AEC for this project to be transferred to the Defense Department. We hope you can see your way clear to support this approach.

In any event we urge you to reexamine the plans for this project immediately and take whatever action is necessary to assure that no further delays are incurred in order that the Government can profit to the maximum amount possible from the economies and other benefits which will result.

Sincerely yours,

CLINTON P. ANDERSON,
Chairman.

COMMENT ON ATOMIC ENERGY COMMISSION RELEASE SCHEDULED FOR 1 P.M. CONCERNING AWARD OF CONTRACT FOR THE FIRST ANTARCTIC NUCLEAR REACTOR AT MCMURDO SOUND

(From the office of Senator HENRY M. JACKSON, Democrat, State of Washington)

Senator HENRY M. JACKSON, Democrat, of Washington, today commended the Atomic Energy Commission for "expeditious action" in awarding a contract for the first Antarctic nuclear power reactor, to be installed at McMurdo Sound.

JACKSON said the quick action of the AEC in awarding a contract would save a full year on the operational date of the first reactor in Antarctica. He said the reactor now should be operational by March 1962.

JACKSON added that he hopes the AEC will act with similar dispatch on procurement required to meet the urgent need for additional reactors at the South Pole Station and Byrd Station in Antarctica.

Reactors at all three stations were authorized by Congress this year at JACKSON'S suggestion before the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, of which he is a member. JACKSON visited Antarctica last fall and was struck by the high cost of conventional fuels and the possibility for using nuclear reactors economically.

Testimony before the Joint Committee showed that nuclear powerplants could cut the cost of power, light, and heat in Antarctica to one-fourth the cost of conventional powerplants.

JACKSON had urged the reactors for Antarctica not only to cut costs, but also to reduce the risk to human life involved in transporting conventional fuel oil by sea and air. He also recommended the reactors on the grounds they would add to this Nation's knowledge in the atomic power field, generally, and would build America's international prestige by being first with nuclear powerplants in this area of peaceful international competition.

Mr. ELLENDER. Does this deal with title III?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes; $13 million.

Mr. ELLENDER. I am glad the Senator has brought up that point, because I understand that the distinguished Senator from Alabama is not present. In addition to what the Senator from New Mexico has said, I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD at this point the report of the committee appearing at page 40, entitled "Title III—Independent Offices" continuing going to page 42 of the report, dealing with the Atomic Energy Commission and the Tennessee Valley Authority.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TITLE III—INDEPENDENT OFFICES

ATOMIC ENERGY COMMISSION—GENERAL STATEMENT

The amount of increase recommended by the committee of $16,900,000 consists of restorations for operating expenses totaling $2,400,000, and increases for plant acquisition and construction totaling $14,500,000. Appropriatiosn for the two items total $2,675,960,000, which is $660,000 over the estimates for the two items of $2,675,300,000.

Recommendations for the activities of the Commission are detailed in the following paragraphs:

OPERATING EXPENSES

1960 appropriation (Atomic Energy Commisison Act, Public Law 86–164)	$2,389,114,000
Estimate, 1961 (including $32,500,000 in H. Doc. 387)	2,459,800,000
House allowance	2,450,560,000
Committee recommendation	2,452,960,000

NOTE—in addition, reappropriation of $37,000,000 and applied revenues of $22,600,000 are available.

The committee recommends an appropriation of $2,452,960,000 for Operating Expenses, which is a reduction of $6,840,000 from the revised estimate of $2,459,800,000, and an increase of $2,400,000 over the House allowance.

Of the restoration recommended, $1,900,000 is for nuclear technology under reactor development, to provide the amount requested of $49,500,000. The committee is advised that there is essential need for maintaining this basic work at the level estimated, in order to provide the information required for the development of new reactor concepts as well as for larger range improvements to existing concepts.

The remaining amount of $500,000 of the restoration recommended is for isotopes development, to provide the full budget estimate of $4,500,000. The committee is advised that the restoration is required in order to assure continuation of the newly developed program of low-dose food irradiations which, if successful, could make a substantial advance in the marketing of otherwise perishable commodities.

The committee further recommends deletion of the proviso limiting funds for the airplane propulsion reactor program to $58 million. The committee is advised that research and development costs in the amount of $73 million are included in the estimate for this program, as follows:

Direct cycle reactor (General Electric Co.)	$41,550,000
Indirect cycle reactor (Pratt, Whitney Co.)	27,500,000
General support (Oak Ridge National Laboratory)	3,950,000
Total	73,000,000

The committee recognizes that large sums have been spent on this program and that it is difficult to determine whether to more actively pursue the direct cycle or the indirect cycle. The committee is advised that the program will be reviewed by the Department of Defense during the year, to determine the military feasibility of one cycle or the other. In the meantime, the committee believes the full amount of the estimate should be available, to allow the Commission to pursue this program without limitation.

Plant acquisition and construction

1960 appropriation (Atomic Energy Commission Act, Public Law 86–164)	$262,500,000
Estimate, 1961	215,500,000
House allowance	208,500,000
Committee recommendation	223,000,000

The committee recommends a total appropriation of $223,000,000 for Plant Acquisition and Construction, an increase of $14,500,000 over the House allowance, and $7,500,000 over the budget estimate. The increase would provide for additional projects, as follows:

Nuclear power reactor plants for the Antarctic (61–d–10)	$13,000,000
Planning and engineering funds funds for materials research laboratory, University of Illinois (61–f–8) and for radiation laboratory, University of Notre Dame (61–f–9)	1,500,000
Total increase	14,500,000

Nuclear power plants for the Antarctic were authorized in Public Law 86–457, and the merits of the project were covered in detail, in hearings on the authorization as well as on the appropriation. The committee is impressed with the savings which would accrue through the use of nuclear energy as compared to the extremely high costs of transporting diesel fuel to the bases at McMurdo Sound, Byrd and Pole stations in the Antarctic. It is estimated that such savings over a few years would pay for this program.

No estimate has been submitted, but the committee is advised that the administration may favor placing the responsibility for this program with the Navy Department, in connection with the logistic support they provide for other programs in the Antarctic. Accordingly, in order to permit such allocation of these funds, the committee recommends inserting the following proviso:

"Provided further, That not to exceed $13,000,000 of this appropriation may be transferred to the appropriation 'Other procurement, Navy', solely for construction of power reactor plants for the Antarctic."

The additional increase of $1,500,000 is recommended to begin work on the projects authorized at the University of Illinois and at the University of Notre Dame by covering the planning and engineering costs of the buildings as authorized.

In agreeing to the general reduction of $10 million made by the House to be offset by slippages and savings, the committee realizes that the Commission, as in previous years, will not be able to obligate under contracts the full amount requested for construction during the fiscal year. No reduction is contemplated on any specific project.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, we appreciate very much the fine way in which the Appropriations Committee has dealt with this problem and the confidence it has shown. I also appreciate the fact that Mr. McCone, the Chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission, has moved forward rapidly in this field, to the great benefit of the country.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield so that I may address a question to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. ELLENDER. I wish to point out, with reference to the Tennessee Valley Authority, that the committee has recommended the exact amount adopted by the House, $20,520,000.

I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. HOLLAND. I am not sure, but I assume that the RECORD will show that the atomic energy facilities proposed to be placed in the Antarctic are in strict accord with the provision exempting the installation of certain facilities in Antarctica that are embraced in the treaty which was ratified by the Senate earlier today.

Mr. ANDERSON. That is correct.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank the Senator.

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. HARTKE. With the permission of the Senator from Louisiana, I send to the desk an amendment and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 4, line 15, it is proposed to strike out "$737,884,600" and insert in lieu thereof "$740,384,600".

Mr. HARTKE. Mr. President, I should like to address myself to the committee itself for the wonderful work the distinguished Senator from Louisiana and the distinguished Senator from Arizona and all the other members of the committee have done with regard to the pending bill. I know of the diligence with which they have worked. I have known the distinguished Senator from Louisiana from the time I was mayor of Evansville, Ind. When I first came to Washington I received his splendid cooperation, and I was told that the committee would do everything that was possible to be done to alleviate flood conditions and help navigation.

I should like to point out that the committee has a very excellent staff member in Mr. Bousquet, who has accompanied me to the State of Indiana and has viewed at firsthand the result of the devastation, destruction, and damage that result when a river gets out of its banks and starts to move.

The amendment I propose must be taken in the light of the fact that the committee has been extremely kind. They have increased certain appropriations with reference to Indiana Harbor; levee unit No. 5, Wabash River; the Mason J. Niclack levee; and the project at West Terre Haute.

I have just returned from a visit to the State of Indiana, where I made an extensive tour of the Wabash Valley, following 4 years of flooding in the last 5 years.

The amendment which I propose would increase the total amount to be appropriated by the bill to $740,384,600. It is an increase of $2½ million.

I believe I should explain the reason why I am asking for the increase. I am firmly convinced that we ought to have flood control and flood protection now, not in perhaps 150 or 200 years from now. Even a casual examination of projects will show that progress is being made. The fact remains that if people are to live in the Wabash Valley, which is behind the times from the standpoint of flood protection, relief must be given now, because if the present rate of flood control protection is continued, it will be 120 years before a substantial amount of protection will be had. I recall a statement made to me by a 65-year-old man at Vincennes, Ind., who said to me, "Senator, I have been attending flood control meetings since I was 18 years of age. I first came to meetings with my father. We talked about planning to reduce damage caused by floods. All through the years I have kept coming back year after year to these meetings. My days on this earth are numbered. I do not expect to see too much done before I pass on. I hope that in some way we can demonstrate to the people in Washington that simply doing these things in piecemeal fashion is not really getting the job done. The damage which is occurring year after year is piling up far in excess of the benefits which could be derived if we went ahead and appropriated the necessary money."

Frankly, I was appalled. I was absolutely astonished at the destruction. Some Senators may recall Clarence McCormick, who was Under Secretary of Agriculture when Claude Wickard was Secretary. I flew over the territory with former Under Secretary McCormick, and over his land—some 700 acres plus. I saw farm after farm in stubble—dry land. There was nothing at all there. Nothing was growing. This is the story: In 4 out of the 5 years the land had been flooded. So far as the people were concerned, there was not much they could do.

Clarence said to me, "I have planted nine times on that land in 5 years. I have harvested one crop and part of another. I don't mind telling you that, financially speaking, one cannot be successful."

Then he pointed out some other fields. He said, "Those people planted last week in the hope they could grow corn. Last year I tried that. They will be lucky if they get gasoline money back."

Then we went farther south, toward the bottom lands along the river. We saw the bottom lands along the river. People had been farming the bottom lands.

We went back about 11 miles into the country, back into the fields. We were on the field road. There was beautiful corn standing on both sides of us. On one side, it was growing wonderfully high. But for many rows on the left-hand side the flood had set in and destroyed the crops.

We were about an hour and a half late at our destination, but those people insisted that I see what had happened. I got out in the middle of the crossroads. More than 50 farmers and their families, including the children, were there to meet me. I do not mind saying that it was hot. They had ice-cold lemonade for us. This was the real thing. It touched me down deep. There was an old surrey, and in it was a little boy dressed in a costume of about 1890. A little girl was sitting with him on the front seat, wearing the same type costume. Her bonnet was pulled over her head and tucked back under her chin. An old coon dog sat on the front seat between them, hooked up with the horse. There they were in this beautiful bottom land. A sign on the side of the wagon, in typical Okie fashion, read, "We're on our way."

An old man, 85 years old, said to me, "This is the first time I have ever felt I did not have the courage to go back and plant again."

That is the human side of this problem. That is why I think that, so far as we in Indiana are concerned, we feel like stepchildren who are begging for help.

The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER] and his colleagues on the committee have done what they could, but what is being done is not enough. We must come back with the story—"This is not enough."

We talk about the watershed program. Thirty-nine watersheds have been so designated in the State of Indiana. One set of engineers works on the program. Everyone admits that one set of engineers can do four projects a year. It is estimated that we need 500 projects to do the minimum job necessary in Indiana. At the present rate, those 39 watersheds which have been started will be completed in 10 years. It will take 125 years to have done the minimum which needs to be done. I do not think we can wait three, four, or five generations to provide the necessary flood-control works. That is why I say we should get the money now. It is not too much to ask for an additional $2,500,000. We need a comprehensive program, one which has been, in some cases, outlined for years. But the progress—and even the authorized progress—is entirely too slow. The farmers need to be protected now. If such protection is not afforded now, all we will do will be to add to the amount of land which is going down the Mississippi and is adding to the delta. We all know that it takes 400 years to create 1 inch of that kind of topsoil.

I think we should get a fair share of funds for these projects now. Frankly, we could use $200 million in Indiana now. I think we could put the people to work. We could put engineers and construction workers to work. I do not want to appear selfish. I am willing to let the Senators from Illinois and Michigan participate in an accelerated program of flood control. I am willing to let them have their fair share of funds, too. I do not feel that we should have all the benefits. But if they do not want to proceed with such projects, we in Indiana are prepared to do so.

I met with the people in 15 major communities during the 5 days I spent in that region. I started at 7 o'clock in the morning, after breakfast. Many times we would continue our traveling until midnight, answering the questions of those people. It was always the same pattern: "When are you going to get the job done?" They do not care how we get it done; they want it done.

This is not merely spending money; it is investing in the future of our natural resources. It is an investment in flood control, water conservation, soil conservation, and bank stabilization, not to mention the prevention of losses of money to farmers and to the communities. It will be repaid many times in the benefits which come from the soil. As we all know, the soil creates wealth and puts it into the community. The net result, south of U.S. Route 40, is that in most communities in Indiana there has been a decrease in the growth of population. That is where the depressed areas are.

So if it is not desired to pass a depressed areas bill, at least we should do the next best thing and invest in the future of these areas.

I talked this afternoon with Gen. E. C. Itschner. I know all of us have great respect for the excellent work he does. He has a sincere interest in the welfare of this country. In my conversation with him, he said that so far as the Corps of Engineers was concerned, they could increase their capabilities and accelerate their program except for the limitation on funds. He also pointed out something else which is true, namely, that at present the salaries which are being paid those whom we expect to do the engineering work are not sufficient. It will not be possible to get competent personnel to do the work. If it is to be done, let us pay them. If we must hire engineers outside the corps, let us hire them. In any event, I think we should get the work done.

General Itschner said, "Let us award the contracts and place no restrictions on the personnel, and we will get the work done."

He said the Wabash basin is now in a position similar to that in which New England was after the disastrous floods of 1955. The Corps of Engineers went into New England at that time under a crash program and got the work done He pointed out the marvelous accomplishments which can be achieved when the urge comes.

We in Indiana are willing to accept responsibilities. Perhaps we have not yelled loud enough up to now. Perhaps we have not displayed proper interest. But we are here now to tell the Senate that we have an interest. We want the cooperation of Congress to get the work done.

The Corps of Engineers made the point that on the specific projects which are fixed now, they can spend more money, and they are willing to go ahead with them. They can accelerate the planning. Let me demonstrate what is involved in the planning: $30,000 has been appropriated for a study of the Wabash Valley. The Corps of Engineers has a capability, by its own statement, of at least $60,000. Approximately $360,000 will be needed to complete the study. At the present rate, it will take 11 years to complete that study.

This is a basin study, not a specific project study. It will take 10 years to get the basic study out of the way. That is why I have offered my amendment to the bill.

I hope the Senator from Louisiana may find it possible to join with me in support of the amendment. I have heard him speak on the floor, time after time, in defense of economy and saving in regard to foreign aid. We spend money for foreign aid to build dams for flood control. We are willing to do that for the benefit of people whom we do not want to see suffer.

Why can we not do it for our own people, people whom we know, who are our friends and relatives? We know their personal conditions. We do not have to rely on somebody in the administration or in a bureau or an agency to tell us of their condition.

If we can spend money to aid foreign countries, if we can use the talents of our engineers to build dams and levees, flood control projects, and sanitation facilities in Africa, Asia, Europe, and Latin America, then I think we can afford to spend funds here. I urge the Senate to give the measure serious consideration. It will demonstrate to the country that we really mean what we say with respect to America; that we want to go forward to build a better America, and we will start with our land, water, and natural resources first.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARTKE. I shall be happy to yield the floor.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I, too, favor foreign aid. But how are we going to keep providing foreign aid if we let the lands in Indiana, Louisiana, and elsewhere deteriorate, when public works are not available in order to create wealth? We cannot make foreign aid available if we do not have the facilities in this country to produce the wealth necessary to provide foreign aid. If wealth, which will produce taxes, is not produced in Indiana, where will the money to be used for foreign aid come from?

Mr. HARTKE. Certainly the Senator from New Mexico is entirely correct.

Recently I was delighted to be in the Senator's State, on my return from a recent important convention on the west coast which propriety may indicate that I not mention by name at this time. Let me say that in Indiana, under normal circumstances, one cow and a calf can be put on an acre of land. But in the Senator's State in many places it takes two sections of land, instead.

Mr. CHAVEZ. In fact, in my country, in the best land, it takes 40 acres to feed a cow.

Mr. HARTKE. That is one section.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Except where the land is irrigated, after the rainfall is placed behind walls, instead of being allowed to run off in flash floods. Confining the water in that way creates wealth, rather than permitting flash floods to destroy the land.

The average production of cotton in the South is 370 pounds to an acre. But if the rainfall is confined and used for irrigation, instead of being permitted to damage the land, as a result of floods, we are able to produce 4 bales of cotton to an acre. That is the difference.

Mr. HARTKE. The Senator is a cotton expert. I know about corn. In Indiana we are now growing 100 bushels of corn to an acre. One of my friends, a graduate of Purdue and a former county agent, said that within 10 years we shall produce 200 bushels of corn to an acre.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Provided they do not let the Wabash River destroy that activity.

Mr. HARTKE. That is correct.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, has the Senator from Indiana concluded?

Mr. HARTKE. Yes.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I wonder whether I may address a technical question to the chairman of the subcommittee.

Mr. ELLENDER. I shall be glad to answer it if I can.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Let me ask this question: If the amendment of the Senator from Indiana were to be agreed to, would I then be foreclosed from offering an amendment—as it is my present intention to do—to strike out the appropriation of $25,000 for levee unit No. 5, on the Wabash River?

Mr. ELLENDER. That is really a parliamentary inquiry. As I understand, the distinguished Senator from Indiana is merely endeavoring to add $2,500,000 in order to accelerate the work, not only in Indiana, but, as I understand, all over the country.

Mr. HARTKE. Yes, all over the country. It would apply only incidentally to Indiana. Of course we would be willing to have the entire $2,500,000 used in Indiana; but we would ask for only our fair share.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Then do I correctly understand that approval of the amendment would not have the effect I fear?

Mr. ELLENDER. The Senator from Illinois should address his question to the Chair.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Then I address the question to the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the amendment of the Senator from Indiana is agreed to and if the amount is thus increased, that amount will not then be open to further amendment.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Then I take it that the Chair's ruling is that if the amendment of the Senator from Indiana is agreed to, a subsequent motion of mine to eliminate the appropriation of $25,000 for the survey of levee unit No. 5, Wabash River, would not be in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It would not be in order, because the Senate would already have passed on that item.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Then, Mr. President, I am compelled—although very reluctantly, of course—to oppose the amendment of the Senator from Indiana.

I do not wish to enter into the debate in regard to levee unit No. 5, at the moment, except to say it is an old, established Hoosier custom to have levees built on their side of the Wabash River, and hence to throw the flood waters onto the Illinois side. That has already been done at Vincennes, Ind. That project protects Vincennes, and we are very glad to have it protected. But the result has been to throw additional quantities of water onto the Illinois side and to flood thousands of additional acres of Illinois land in Lawrence County.

The present proposal in regard to levee unit No. 5 is again to put levees on the Indiana side at, and especially below, Mount Carmel, with the net result of benefiting a few large-scale, rich farmers who own land on the Indiana side, but causing additional flooding on the Illinois side.

So, although I have great affection for the Senator from Indiana, I am not here to sacrifice the farm lands of Illinois in order to help rich landowners in Indiana. That is a well-established Hoosier custom but I do not believe in yielding to it.

Since we now have a technical ruling by the Chair that if the amendment of the Senator from Indiana is agreed to, I shall be foreclosed from attempting, later on, to move to eliminate the appropriation of $25,000 for the preconstruction planning of levee unit No. 5, I shall most reluctantly, be compelled to oppose the amendment of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. HARTKE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. HARTKE. Let me say to my distinguished friend, the Senator from Illinois, that in the course of my recent trip it was my pleasure to visit with many of his fine constituents. They had nothing but the finest things to say about him.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am very glad of that.

Mr. HARTKE. I met with them almost all the way along, beginning near Covington. It was also my pleasure to trespass on his property. [Laughter.] I visited his fair city of Grayville, where the distinguished mayor and the chamber of commerce and more than 100 of the very fine citizens met with me, and also visited in Mount Carmel, and went down to see their river lands.

Just across from the area the Senator has mentioned, I saw the improvised levee on the banks of the Wabash and I saw the work done by the Army Engineers. When the flood warnings came, they proceeded, in their hip boots, to use great quantities of sand bags to try to keep out the water. They damned a small river, overnight, and saved many thousands of acres of Illinois farmland, by virtue of the fact that the water did not go 6 inches higher.

But my distinguished friend makes a very fine argument for what I am talking about, namely, a comprehensive flood program; and I would include the State of Illinois.

I shall not even discuss, at the moment, the merits of levee unit No. 5. But if the Senator from Illinois fears that my amendment would preclude the offering of the amendment he has in mind, why does not he offer his amendment to my amendment? That would avoid the technicality, and thereby the Senator from Illinois would give the Senate an opportunity really to demonstrate its interest in protecting those fine Illinois farms.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Of course there is an old maxim, "Beware the Greeks bearing gifts." So I beware of Hoosiers when they propose to put levees on their side of the Wabash and to throw additional quantities of water onto the Illinois side, because we know very well what they did at Vincennes and what they are trying to do in this instance.

What my friend wants is to require the Illinois farmers to buy higher hip boots when more water is thrown onto our side of the river, from Indiana. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARTKE. All I say is that I am interested in having $25,000 made available for use by the Corps of Army Engineers, to make additional studies, so the floods will not occur and so flood damage will not be done, not only at Mount Carmel, but elsewhere.

I wish the Senator from Illinois had been with me when I was there. The farmers in the communities there had absolutely nothing to which to look forward. If the Senator from Illinois had gone into the area, as I did, and had seen the farmers gather around the elevator in the middle of a hot afternoon and ask for any kind of help, I am sure he would have been as impressed as I was. I certainly shall be delighted to go there and try to settle any problems the Senator from Illinois may have in regard to levee No. 5.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I have also traveled down the Wabash. And I have done so at floodtime. I would be perfectly ready to give protection on the Indiana side equal to any protection we have on the Illinois side. I would like to see a levee protecting the city of Mount Carmel on the Illinois side, and I would be glad to have a levee on the Indiana side directly opposite so there would be equal protection.

But my friend from Indiana knows perfectly well what is at stake is not alone the protection of Mount Carmel, but also the question whether the protection of the farmlands below Mount Carmel is to be confined to the Indiana side.

The current plans of the Army Engineers are for a levee on the Indiana side, but for no corresponding levee on the Illinois side, with the net result that the lands on the Indiana side will be protected, but at the expense of land on the Illinois side. Unless the Senator is interested in the hip boot industry and the wearing of hip boots by the people in Illinois, I hope he does not try to play again the game that his predecessors did at Vincennes.

Mr. HARTKE. Does the Senator believe the Army Engineers to be biased in their opinion or that they would give an opinion that was not truthful in regard to this particular area?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Their statements show that Illinois will be damaged.

Mr. HARTKE. I will not ask the Senator to answer it, but I point out that the Army Engineers have made a study and have determined that there is a cost-benefit ratio which means that the benefit to be derived by the people in this area, including Illinois and Indiana, is 1.7 to 1.

Mr. DOUGLAS. But the net result would be a detriment to the State of Illinois. There would of course be some benefit to the State of Indiana. What I am saying is that there should be equal sharing of the benefits by the residents on the Illinois side.

Mr. HARTKE. I am talking about people. The cost-benefit ratio—benefit to the people in the overall program—will be 1.7 to 1, according to the Army Engineers. I think the committee, in its determination of the evidence, was right when it said it should not be delayed, because the committee considers this an important project that should be built at an early date.

The committee said in the report:

> The committee does not feel that the needed flood protection for levee unit No. 5, which was authorized in 1936, should be postponed indefinitely.

Also, it took into consideration Mount Carmel, and it approved $10,000 in the budget for a study of Mount Carmel; but it also approved an additional $15,000 for a survey. Nobody is building anything there this year. All the Engineers are going to do is study the project.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Since the Senator from Indiana has quoted the Army Engineers, let me quote from page 2710 of the hearings, the second paragraph of their statement:

> The Corps of Engineers recognizes that the construction of levee unit No. 5 will increase the flood level at Mount Carmel, the frequency of damaging floods, and the annual average flood damage in Wabash County, Ill.—

This is on the Illinois side—> the extent of which would be determined during the course of a study.

In other words, it is clear from the Corps of Engineers' official comments that it is proposed to injure Mount Carmel and Wabash County in Illinois and then to have a study made to find out how much injury will be inflicted. That is both cold and wet comfort.

Mr. HARTKE. If the Senator will read further in the report, he will find that not only was this matter taken into consideration, but was presented to the people of Mount Carmel. Additional funds are allocated to Mount Carmel.

I suggest that the Senator offer his suggestion as an amendment to my amendment, so this question may be disposed of now, in order not to jeopardize the opportunity which the Senate has of demonstrating to the country the truth of the fact that we are interested in conserving the wealth of the United States for ourselves and our children.

If the Senator will do that, I am sure he will not be prejudiced in any way by having the question determined at this time.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Since the Senator from Indiana implies that the people of Mount Carmel desire to have levee unit

No. 5 erected on the Indiana side, let me say that I have been in touch with the Honorable Harry C. Miller, mayor of Mount Carmel, and the people representing farmowners on the Illinois side, including the Wabash County Flood Protection Committee, under the chairmanship of Leonard W. Koger, Jr. I have been in touch with them. They are opposed to this proposal. I have had a heavy volume of mail from Illinois constituents in opposition to it. And I am informed that 104 Indiana residents, as well, have filed a suit contesting the levee district's legality.

If we could get a ruling that the approval of the amendment of the Senator from Indiana would not foreclose my later amendment, I would be willing to reconsider my position on his pending proposal.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I regret to say that I shall oppose the amendment proposed by the distinguished Senator from Indiana. As I stated in my opening remarks, the committee tried to balance this bill. Because of conditions that exist in Indiana, the committee has provided funds for 10 projects in Indiana, 3 of which are for the planning of reservoirs on the Wabash River.

I regret to say that it required a calamity in the northeastern part of our country to awaken the people of New England. I well remember that projects in that area had been authorized back in 1936——

Mr. CHAVEZ. In 1934. Eighteen of them.

Mr. ELLENDER. And the people were not interested in them. No effort was made to provide funds to build dams to prevent floods. It required a great hurricane and a great disaster to awaken the people. Almost the same situation exists in the State of Indiana. We did not hear too much about that area until the great flood of 3 or 4 years ago. Since then we have provided funds to plan 3 reservoirs in the upper Wabash River Basin. In addition, we have provided for the construction of levees in order to avert future floods.

I believe that the committee has treated Indiana very fairly; I do not think it would help the Indiana situation much to provide an additional amount of $2½ million that could be applied anywhere in the country as the Engineers see fit.

If the Senator desires to ask for more funds for any of these projects, I suggest that, instead of offering an amendment which would provide funds to be used all over the country, he be specific and come before the committee next week.

The committee will then have under consideration a supplemental appropriation bill. As I understand, a new title will be added to the mutual security bill to provide for supplemental appropriations.

If the distinguished Senator from Indiana can make a case, I am sure the Committee on Appropriations, will give him a hearing and perhaps may comply with his request. But I beg of the Senate not to accept this amendment to the bill, because, as I have said, we have provided a balanced bill. If we open this bill to amendment, I can readily understand that many Senators would like to have some projects which have been authorized provided for in this bill.

It would open up the flood gates. We might lose many of the projects we now have, which I believe, we can defend before the conference when it occurs.

Mr. HARTKE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at this point?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield for a question.

Mr. HARTKE. Will the Senator yield for a comment?

Mr. ELLENDER. Very well.

Mr. HARTKE. In the first place, I wish to say that at no time have I intended any reflection upon the work of the committee, and certainly I have never intended a reflection upon my distinguished friend from Louisiana, for whom I have the highest regard. I know of the diligence and the close study with which the Senator from Louisiana approaches these matters.

The Senator makes a comment about opening up the floodgates. This is what I would like to stop. I do not wish to open up the floodgates. I wish to close the floodgates.

The Senator says that other Senators will want projects added. If there are other projects which should be done this year, the Senator and I know that putting the projects off until next year will not make them any cheaper. Putting the projects off until next year will not keep the land from being flooded.

Mr. ELLENDER. I will say to my friend that I have been making this argument for the past 7 or 8 years. It was a very hard task to get the few projects we got in the bill.

As I pointed out in my opening statement, we have added 34 new projects the cost of which will be in excess of $520 million. If we add more to the list, we may be met again with a veto, for all I know.

I believe the bill as it now stands is a well-balanced bill and under the circumstances it is my considered judgment that Indiana has been well taken care of.

I certainly would like to be able to increase the recommendations to comply with what the Senator has requested. If I should do so, I fear I might endanger passage of the bill. I know we would have a great deal of trouble getting the House conferees to agree to any additional sums of money above those that we have now included in the bill.

Mr. HARTKE. I compliment my distinguished friend for arguing for this program for 7 or 8 years. I think that is a fine attitude. I do not wish to have my friend stop his argument now. I should like to have him continue. I should like to give the Senator an opportunity to demonstrate his devotion to the cause.

Mr. ELLENDER. I have not stopped. We added 34 new projects.

Mr. HARTKE. I understand. We can spend this amount of money easily.

I ask my distinguished friend if we really should be fearful of a veto. I am not afraid of a veto. I think the people should know the facts. If the people know the facts they will meet the veto.

I think if the President, instead of making the visits he made or in addition to making the visits he made to foreign countries, would visit around in our country and see the conditions of our own people, he would be hard pressed to veto a bill. At least, in my judgment he would have a hard time putting his head on his pillow at night after a veto.

This is the point I am talking about. I am talking about people and their lives. I hope my distinguished friend will at least give me a chance, and give himself a chance, to have the Senate support his position of the past 7 or 8 years.

Mr. ELLENDER. I will say to my good friend that there are many areas in the United States today in which we could use much more money than we have provided. The increase in the bill of $82 million for flood control and rivers and harbors, I think, goes pretty far. I am willing to work as hard as I can in order to get the House of Representatives to agree to the increases which we have recommended.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I believe that there is a limit beyond which we cannot go. If my good friend will be patient and will appear before the committee next week, the committee certainly will listen to him. I would much prefer that the Senator be specific as to the projects with respect to which he desires additions, rather than simply asking to have placed in the bill an additional amount of $2½ million. In my opinion, that is not a good way to proceed. There are some projects I know of which are as worthy as the one about which the Senator is now talking.

Mr. HARTKE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. HARTKE. So far as the costs are concerned, we know the costs will go up in the future. We know that every project which is authorized must show a greater benefit than the cost. This is not a waste of money; this is a saving of money.

Certainly we can spend $2½ million. The Senator says this proposal is not specific enough. I point out to my distinguished friend that we are being much more specific—since this at least will go to our people in the United States—than the foreign aid specifications are. I remember that when my friend from Alaska tried to require some specifics with regard to the foreign aid expenditures it was said, "Oh, no, we do not want to be specific for the foreign aid program. Give us the money, and let us determine where it will be spent."

I have the utmost confidence in General Itschner and in the Corps of Engineers. I do not think they will waste a penny. I think the Senator will agree that if we provide $2½ million to the Corps of Engineers not 1 penny will be wasted. We will receive many, many times more benefits than the cost of what we put into the projects.

Mr. ELLENDER. I agree with that statement. I would hesitate to overload the bill and endanger its passage.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. CAPEHART. Do I correctly understand that the amendment calls for a $2½ million addition to the bill, for expenditure by the Corps of Engineers wherever the Corps of Engineers wishes? The Corps of Engineers might spend some money in Indiana, or might not.

Mr. ELLENDER. That is correct. That is my understanding.

Mr. CAPEHART. The Corps of Engineers might spend all of the money in Indiana, or might spend all of the money in Mississippi, but that would be a matter within the discretion of the Corps of Engineers.

Mr. ELLENDER. That is my understanding.

Mr. CAPEHART. Do I correctly understand that the able Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] is objecting to that, and may offer an amendment to delete from the present bill the $25,000 for levee unit No. 5, whereas if the $2½ million amendment were to be withdrawn the Senator would agree to the $25,000?

Mr. DOUGLAS. No, that is not true. My objection is to the $25,000 for levee unit No. 5. I object to the $2½ million only because it would foreclose my proposal to eliminate the $25,000.

Mr. CAPEHART. Would not the able Senator from Illinois go along with the request for $25,000 for levee unit No. 5?

Mr. DOUGLAS. No, because it is a typical Hoosier practice of building levees on the Indiana side of the Wabash River, and then when there is a flood, the flood is on the Illinois side.

Mr. CAPEHART. Every river has two sides.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Apparently the Senators from Indiana believe that the Wabash has only one side, judging from the experience we have had.

Mr. CAPEHART. If every Senator took the position of the able Senator, we would never have any flood control or any levees in the United States.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I simply ask our Indiana friends to provide levees on both sides of the river, and not merely on one side. The Indiana people have protected themselves at our expense at Vincennes. Now they propose to do the some thing to the south.

Mr. CAPEHART. The best answer in the world to the Senator's question is, Why not introduce proposed legislation for a levee on the Illinois side?

Mr. DOUGLAS. No. We cannot put authorizing legislation into this appropriation bill.

Mr. CAPEHART. Why is the Senator opposed to us, when we had the aggressiveness and good sense to have the appropriation bill provide funds to study a levee, when nothing has been done on the Illinois side? Do the people of Illinois understand that?

Mr. DOUGLAS. If the Senators from Indiana——

Mr. CAPEHART. I am willing to put it to a vote.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Just a moment, please.

If the Senators from Indiana would agree that this study is to be for levees protecting the city of Mount Carmel, Ill.——

Mr. CAPEHART. It is.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Just a minute, please. If the Senators would agree that it is to protect the city of Mount Carmel, Ill., and corresponding lands on the other side of the river, that would be perfectly satisfactory, but the present proposal is to draw up the construction plans to build levees on the farm lands south of Mount Carmel on the Indiana side, not on the Illinois side.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. The result of construction there will be flooding on our side of the river.

Mr. CAPEHART. We are not talking about building levees at all. We are talking about studying the advisability of building levees.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I know.

Mr. CAPEHART. I am perfectly willing to vote to study the advisability of building levees on the Illinois side at Mount Carmel, as well as on the Indiana side. I have always been willing to do so.

I do not understand why the able Senator is opposed to this item, because it calls only for a study of the advisability of work on the Illinois side.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will say to my good friend from Indiana that he either does not recognize the difference between preconstruction planning money and study money, or he is very successful in concealing the difference.

As the Senator well knows, the levee on the Indiana side was approved and authorized many years ago. The money which would be spent there would be for the detailed engineering plans. The levee on the Illinois side has not been approved, and therefore any money appropriated in relation to it would merely be for a survey to determine whether there should be a levee.

Mr. CAPEHART. There is no question with regard to whether——

Mr. DOUGLAS. If the Senate is willing to authorize detailed engineering plans for levees on the Illinois side, to match the levees on the Indiana side, that will be satisfactory. But it cannot do that until studies are completed and authorizing legislation is passed. To attempt merely to have another study at this time to determine whether there should be levees on our Illinois side of the river, and to go ahead with construction plans for levees on the other side of the river, is the famous 50–50 game of one horse and one rabbit, with the horse going to the Indiana group and the rabbit going to the Illinois group.

The Senators from Indiana may believe we are like rabbits, but we are not jackasses.

Mr. CAPEHART. Judging from the way the able Senator from Illinois talks, Indiana always gets the better of the deal, and perhaps we are jackasses. Those are the words of the Senator from Illinois, not mine. The RECORD will show the intimation that we always get the better of a transaction, that we are wiser than the people of Illinois, and that we know how to do things and they do not.

I will vote either to study, to plan or to build a levee around Mount Carmel, Ill., because I think it is needed. I will vote for that, and I will vote for levee No. 5 in Indiana. I will vote to support both of them. But, unfortunately, the able Senator from Illinois did not come here with an amendment or a bill to make the necessary study and plan to build a levee at Mount Carmel, and until he does so, I cannot support his request. When he does, I shall support him.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, with respect to the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana, may I ask what has been the plan now and in the past with respect to earmarking money for planning purposes, as distinguished from putting it into a general pool?

Mr. ELLENDER. Planning money is usually specific as to each project, whereas for surveys, as I indicated a while ago, the money is provided in a lump sum and we leave it to the engineers to allocate the survey money to various projects.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARTKE] is directed to planning money.

Mr. ELLENDER. Planning and construction.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The amendment seeks to earmark $2½ million, which is contrary to the practices under which the committee has operated in the past?

Mr. ELLENDER. It is to a large extent, and that is why I am suggesting to my good friend from Indiana that he appear before the committee next week with a proposal to earmark a specific amount for certain projects, and let the engineers come in and state their capability on those projects.

It strikes me that we would gain time by following that procedure. I have been advocating that kind of action ever since I first came to the Senate, in order to conserve and protect our water resources. But sympathetic as I am to providing more money, with the little amount we have added from year to year, I would foresee objection, as we have had objection in the past, from 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue. I hope that the Senate will stand by the committee and reject this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARTKE].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARTKE. Mr. President, I offer an amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 3, line 19, it is proposed to strike out "$13,062,800" and insert in lieu thereof "$14,062,800".

Mr. HARTKE. Mr. President, I should like to make a brief statement upon the amendment. The amendment is along the same line as the previous amendment. It goes to the question of funds for surveys, concerning which there is no specified designation at the present time as to projects. The amendment calls for an increase of $1 million in the funds allotted for the use of the Corps of Engineers. I believe this amount is necessary. I think it can be utilized, and in the long run it will not only save the United States money in costs, with respect to what we must appropriate, but also, as I indicated previously, it will represent a saving to the property owners and to the people of America in the conservation of our water resources.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, let me say to my good friend that we increased the amount over the budget request by almost $4 million, and we shall have a hard time to retain half of the increase recommended. What the committee did was to take into consideration all of the projects for surveys that were submitted to the committee, and if the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARTKE] will refer to page 4, he will see that we have provided the method by which the allocation of the total amount may be distributed:

> The committee reaffirms its position that an active, well-balanced survey program is the keystone of an orderly and sound water resource program.
> As in the past, the committee prefers not to make specific allocations to individual investigations. It desires, however, to call to the attention of the Corps of Engineers the testimony presented to the committee with respect to the need for increased amounts for surveys contained in its tentative allocation of budget recommendations, and expects that increased amounts will be applied to those surveys where feasible.

I wish to say at this point that the total sum of $13 million-plus which the committee has recommended, which, as I said, is almost $4 million more than the budget estimate, will in a measure provide for most of the worthy projects that have already been submitted to the committee for consideration.

Mr. HARTKE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. HARTKE. I compliment my distinguished friend again upon what he has done, but the people will state, as we talk with them, that we are not going fast enough. The Army Engineers will tell us, if we ask them, that they can use this money. They have said so in the testimony. As I previously said, General Itschner and the other Army personnel are distinguished generals. We have a general in the White House. I think they should confer a little and that those men should be given an opportunity to utilize their abilities.

Mr. ELLENDER. They did confer with General Itschner. General Itschner made a proposal to the White House, and the entire recommendation was only $9,700,000. We increased that amount to $13,062,800, which is almost $4 million above the budget estimate, as I said. It is almost $2¼ million above what the House approved. So it is evident that we shall have difficulty in obtaining even the amount that we recommended. I should like to insert $15 million for the survey program, but I wish to be realistic. It is my belief that the amount recommended for surveys in the aggregate of $13,062,800, if we can obtain it, will be adequate, to cover the most urgent studies which have been submitted to us by various witnesses who have appeared before the committee.

I hope that the amendment offered by my good friend from Indiana will be rejected.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President——

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President——

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield first to my good friend from Kansas.

Mr. CARLSON. I appreciate the distinguished Senator from Louisiana yielding to me, because before we reach a vote on the civil functions appropriations bill, I expect to speak on the items for the Army Corps of Engineers and the Bureau of Reclamation. I wish to commend the subcommittee and its distinguished chairman for the part they had in planning for an orderly program of construction for flood control and for the Bureau of Reclamation. I was pleased that the chairman of the subcommittee read this section of the report:

> The committee reaffirms its position that an active, well-balanced survey program is the keystone of an orderly and sound water resource program.

I was a Member of the House of Representatives in 1936 when we wrote the first comprehensive Flood Control Act in this Nation.

I have observed with great interest the orderly program that is being carried out through the direction of our distinguished chairman and the Committee on Appropriations, and the Bureau of Reclamation, and the Corps of Engineers. I wish to commend them for the increases they have recommended for studies, in order that we may have future projects and keep them on schedule.

I hope the House will agree to the item the committee has recommended for additional study. For instance, it has increased the item for flood control studies from $3,561,600 to $4,946,100.

That is a commendable item. I wish to congratulate the committee. I know from past experience that it will be difficult to hold to that item.

We have many projects in Kansas. I could mention several. I hope some of them will be included. There is, for example, the Walnut River project, and the Cow Creek project. They are programs for the future. We need them, as has been stated by my distinguished senior colleague earlier in the debate.

We in Kansas wish to express our appreciation to the chairman of the subcommittee for the projects which have been included. I can assure him that I will continue to support him as he comes in with orderly programs on an orderly basis.

Mr. ELLENDER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I wish to make a brief statement about the committee report, because it is appropriate to the problem that has been raised by the able Senator from Indiana. I commend him for his vigilance and diligence in respect to the interests of his State.

We have before us a committee report which I believe represents not only hours of very hard work on the part of the committee, but is also, I believe, an impartial and fair report, which balances the equities of the various projects which the committee had to consider.

I make this comment because I see before me four Members of the Senate who I believe have been very fair in handling such projects as these. I do not exclude any other members of the Committee on Appropriations, but these four Senators, with whom I have worked on projects in Oregon are present in the Chamber. I speak, of course, of the chairman of the subcommittee, the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER]; the chairman of the full committee, the distinguished Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN]; the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ]; and my neighbor to the north of my State, the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON]. I have always received very fair and impartial consideration from the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DWORSHAK], and from the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG].

What has been our procedure before the Committee on Appropriations? We have all had an opportunity to appear before the committee and to ask for additions to the President's budget estimates on the basis of information that we have received from the Army Engineers as to how much they could efficiently and effectively spend. On more than one occasion the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER] and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ] and their committee have given a very understanding hearing to me on the basis of this argument.

TRIBUTE TO SENATOR KEFAUVER

This is the first time that I have had the pleasure of seeing the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER] in the Chamber, to express my congratulations to him. I do so now.

[Applause, Senators rising.]

Returning to the point I was making, we have all had an opportunity to appear before the various subcommittees of the Committee on Appropriations. The Senators I have mentioned, as well as other members of the committee, have given us fair and full hearings. At those hearings we have presented what the Army Engineers have advised us they could spend efficiently and effectively.

The committee itself has to work within the realm of realities. I believe the committee has done that in regard to the report. The Senator from Louisiana is quite right. Sympathetic as I am with the proposal made by the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARTKE], as a matter of principle, if we ever start modifying the report of the committee by asking to have added to each one of these items an increase in the amount of money that the Army Engineers tells us they can spend for some of these projects, what will we do? We will write the bill on the floor of the Senate. We will not have the benefit of the testimony and the balancing of interests that the committee has had the benefit of.

I have just returned from a rather extensive trip through my State. I believe the Senator from Louisiana will be interested to hear me say this. I made many speeches and held many conferences with my constituents. I was surprised to find that the No. 1 issue raised with me, of the many issues of concern to the people of my State, was the matter of appropriations for needed projects in my State. My State at the present time is in a very serious economic slump because the bottom has fallen out of the lumber industry. Mill after mill is closing down. Thousands of lumber workers do not have any jobs today, although they hope that perhaps next week, or the week after, or the month after there will be jobs for them. To a large extent, my State is a one-industry State. We need to have much greater diversity, and that is why we need so many of the projects which are involved in the committee report. We need to diversify our economy.

The Senator from Louisiana will be pleased to know that although on many occasions I mentioned before these audiences the names of the Senators I have mentioned on the floor this afternoon, various groups in my State are aware of the great service that the Senator from Louisiana has performed through his impartial handling of these appropriation items in the appropriation bill.

For example, I refer to the Green Peter project, which is one of the projects for which the State of Oregon is receiving funds in the appropriation bill. The administration recommended $1,400,000. The Senator from Louisiana knows that I appeared before the committee and pleaded for the amount the Army Engineers stated they could efficiently and effectively spend. When we slow down projects for lack of funds, we waste taxpayers' money. There is no economy when we get a project under way and then stop it or delay it. There is no saving of taxpayers' money if we do not proceed with it as rapidly as we can to completion, so that it can start making profits which will return its costs to the Treasury of the United States.

In this instance the committee, under the leadership of the distinguished Senator from Louisiana, saw fit to increase the President's request from $1,400,000 to $2 million. As the Senator knows, this has been one of my pet projects. This is one of the projects that I have had to battle for over a period of years, first to stop it from being given away under a partnership concept some years ago. In those years all we could get was planning money. Once the construction was started, the Senator from Louisiana and the other members of the committee have speeded up construction by speeding up appropriations.

I believe the RECORD should show that the people of Coos Bay have specifically ask me to express to the Senator from Louisiana and his colleagues their appreciation for the fact that $23,000 for planning on the Coos and Millicoma River project, which the President recommended but which the House dropped, has been restored in the Senate verison of the bill. So we can go ahead at least with the planning for this much needed project.

I could take each one of these projects and report to the Senator from Louisiana the deep appreciation of the people of my State living within the economic environment of each project.

I thank the Senator from Louisiana and the members of his subcommittee for what I believe has been fair dealing. It does not mean that the senior Senator from Oregon would not have liked to have more. I asked for more in regard to a good many of these projects. That was my duty as legislative counsel for my State. But I may say, as counsel in the case, so to speak, that in my judgment the court was just and fair, and I thank it for the fair dealing it gave to the people of Oregon.

Mr. ELLENDER. I thank the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I, too, wish to express my appreciation to the chairman of the committee and to the Committee on Appropriations for this bill, which appropriates funds for vitally needed flood control and navigation projects all over the Nation, but in this instance, in particular, for the State of Minnesota. The two Senators from Minnesota and members of the other body have testified in favor of important projects which will add to the economic well-being of our State and to its economic productivity.

I am particularly appreciative of project funds to plan the construction of a navigation project in the outer harbor of the Duluth, Minn.-Superior, Wis., harbor. The bill appropriates $60,000. I assure Senators that this is a project which means much to the entire Great Lakes area.

Also, the bill appropriates $50,000 to plan the construction of a navigation project in the inner harbor of the Duluth-Superior harbor.

To construct a 9-foot channel in the Minnesota River, the bill appropriates $500,000. That channel, by the way, leads down into the grain-processing areas of Minnesota and into some of our newly developed industrial areas. It will mean a great saving to the people of our State and will be a great help to the industrial future of the State.

To rectify damages on the Mississippi River between the Missouri River and Minneapolis, Minn., the bill authorizes $2,660,000.

To construct improvements in the Red River of the North drainage basin, the bill appropriates $368,000. Anyone who has been in that area knows the problems which have developed in floods. I can assure the Senator from Louisiana, who is an economy-minded Senator, and whose record in that field is most exemplary, that no sum of money will be better used than that which has been appropriated for the Red River of the North, in the drainage area where there have been severe problems resulting from floods over the years.

The bill appropriates the sum of $60,000 for the construction of a flood control project on the Redwood River at Marshall, Minn. There have been two or three serious floods in that area in the past 7 years, causing not $60,000, but literally hundreds of thousands, even millions of dollars in damages.

To plan the construction of a flood control project at Rushford, Minn., the bill appropriates $75,000.

To construct a navigation project at St. Anthony Falls, the bill appropriates $4,900,000.

To plan the construction of a flood control project at St. Paul and South St. Paul, the bill appropriates $500,000.

I am certain the Senator from Louisiana and his colleagues know that about 4 years ago a flood occurred in that area which cost the people of that area millions of dollars. I hesitate to give the exact amount, but it was more than $10 million. This flood control project is desperately needed.

To plan the construction of a navigation project at Two Harbors, the bill appropriates $6,000.

To plan for the construction of a flood control project at Winona, Minn., the bill appropriates $80,000.

I desire to express the gratitude of all Minnesotans for the excellent and painstaking work of the Committee on Appropriations, and especially the subcommittee and its chairman on this important measure.

I am pleased that the committee added funds for two navigation projects in the Duluth, Minn.-Superior, Wis., harbor, and an appropriation for a navigation project at Winona, Minn. Each of these three projects was authorized in the omnibus rivers and harbors bill as enacted into law on July 14, 1960.

These projects are extremely important to the economy of northern Minnesota. According to a recent study, the Duluth-Superior harbor had more traffic in 1958, than any other of the 19 Great Lakes harbors, and has a benefit-cost ratio of 19.3 to 1, higher than most of the other Great Lakes harbors. Two Harbors is also a major Great Lakes port, and has the highest benefit-cost ratio of any Great Lakes harbor—68 to 1.

The citizens of northern Minnesota are concerned that unless Congress approves these projects to deepen the harbors of Duluth-Superior and Two Harbors, these ports will not be able to take advantage of the opportunities of the St. Lawrence Seaway. Citizens of other States will suffer also because Duluth-Superior and Two Harbors are the most westerly ports of the St. Lawrence Seaway system and service much of the northern region of the Midwest. These citizens, however, are confident that the Senate will approve these projects which are so necessary to the well-being of their region's economy.

The citizens of Minnesota were also pleased that the Senate Appropriations Committee concurred in the House approval of funds to initiate construction of the St. Paul-South St. Paul flood control project. They had been disappointed when the 1961 budget of the administration did not recommend funds for this project. Three times in the last 10 years, the Mississippi River has flooded these communities and caused more than $12 million of direct damage and many more millions of indirect damages. The financial wisdom of this project is obvious when the fact is known that its cost is $7,070,000, less than two-thirds the direct damages incurred in the past 10 years. This project is even more urgent for humanitarian reasons. Three times in the past decade more than 6,000 residents had to flee their homes; many returned to find their possessions either damaged or lost. For at least a month after each of the three floods, 14,000 workers remained unemployed. Such hardships place a great burden on local financial resources, a burden which the Federal Government should help to bear.

The water problems of Minnesota are not unique, and these Senators who represent States with similar water problems will, I am sure, join with me to voice our appreciation for the tireless efforts and deep good will which has characterized the work of the Senate Appropriations Committee as they considered this bill. Their recommendations deserve the support of all of us.

I heartily support the bill which is before the Senate. I thank the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I join in congratulating the members of the Committee on Appropriations for the work they have done on the bill. I think it is an exceptionally good bill. I especially wish to thank the distinguished senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER] for his constructive work and his fair conduct of the time-consuming hearings on the proposed legislation. I know that a number of citizens of my State have come each year to testify on various aspects of the program, which is so important in my State, and they are always received with courtesy and are given a fair hearing.

I also wish to express my appreciation to my colleague, the distinguished senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN], for the fine work he has done on the bill. Arkansas is fortunate in having its senior Senator in such a strategic position on the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. President, the bill, although drawn up before the Democratic convention began, represents a major step in carrying out the natural resources plank in our party's platform. This plank states the truism that "natural resources are the birthright of all the people." It goes on to say that the Democratic party will promote a comprehensive national resource policy and bring renewed vigor to preserving and developing the Nation's resources. This bill is a positive step in getting under way a more concentrated effort to protect our natural resources birthright. I feel certain that a new Democratic administration will mean the beginning of a forward-looking program of sound resource conservation work.

The committee's recommendations for the Arkansas River program are a substantial boost to expediting work on this promising project. The development of the Arkansas River for navigational purposes should bring unprecedented economic development to the Arkansas Valley area. Our Nation's past experience with other navigation projects, such as in the Ohio Valley, illustrates the possibilities for regional industrial expansion from low-cost water transportation. The addition of $4 million for bank stabilization over the House-approved amendment was good news to the supporters of the program. Bank stabilization is an essential element of the overall project, and I hope it will be considered as such by the Budget officials from now on. I am also pleased that $200,000 has been added for initiating planning on additional locks and dams in the system. Although the Engineers could have effectively used more money, this is at least a substantial start on the planning for these units.

The committee has recommended $500,000 for construction on Millwood Reservoir.

This has been one of the most difficult projects to get under way in my State. The senior Senator from Louisiana is thoroughly familiar with the project, and I am particularly pleased that this appropriation is included in the bill.

This project will provide flood control and water supplies for a large area of southwest Arkansas. Substantial funds have already been appropriated for the project, and there is no valid reason why the Budget Bureau should recommend against further appropriations to continue the work. The $500,000 will be sufficient to get the project well under way. The Southwest Arkansas Water District has been organized and is in operation to handle the distribution of water from the project. I am hopeful that the project will now proceed as rapidly as possible.

Beaver Reservoir, which is very near my home town of Fayetteville, is scheduled to be allocated $2,800,000 in construction funds. This is the last unit in the White River Basin program and will be an important asset in helping bring about further economic development in northwest Arkansas.

I was especially pleased that the committee added $150,000 to initiate planning on the Ouachita River navigation project. The existing navigation channel has been outmoded for years, and modernization and deepening of the channel was authorized in this year's public works authorization bill. The Ouachita Valley is rich in natural and human resources, and the availability of cheap water transportation should make the region even more attractive to outside industry. There have been many frustrations and disappointments in connection with this project, and the appropriation of planning funds will be welcome news to the citizens of this area.

There are other Arkansas projects in this bill which I could mention, but I will not take up any further time of the Senate in doing so. I did want to express my appreciation to the members of the committee for their favorable consideration of the items which are so important to the citizens of my State. I know the people of Arkansas are grateful for the committee's foresight in understanding our water problems.

I hope that all of the Arkansas projects will be retained in the conference committee.

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. President, included in this appropriation bill are funds for the AEC amounting to $2,452,960,000 for operating expenses and $223 million for plant acquisition and construction. The Commission estimates that within this fiscal year the AEC in Idaho at the NRTS, a total of $40,103,000 will be spent as operating expenses and $30,269,000 for construction work.

Of particular interest to NRTS is the Senate deletion of a proviso placed in the bill by the House of Representatives which would have limited the aircraft nuclear propulsion program to $58 million during the coming year. The Senate bill in removing this limitation approved the expected expenditure for this program up to $73 million for research and development. Of this, approximately $41,550,000 is expected to be spent on a direct cycle reactor—General Electric Co.—and $27,500,000 on the indirect cycle reactor—Pratt Whitney Co. Work on both these cycles is being done at the NRTS and it is expected, at some time in the future, on the basis of research and development work now being done by the Commission, that a determination will be made as to which of the two approaches will be selected for the flying prototype.

Other projects in which money appropriated for fiscal year 1961 will be spent in Idaho at the NRTS are the following:

The Navy reactor program, including the natural circulation reactor under contract with General Electric on which construction has not as yet begun.

Construction of additional technical space for the SPERT reactor—$500,000.

Beginning of construction of an additional test reactor at the ETR–MTR site—$24 million.

Additions and modifications to the MTR–ETR in the amount of $800,000.

There is widespread interest in the development of a nuclear-powered aircraft, to prevent our being embarrassed by a similar development behind the Iron Curtain.

The coming year will see Idaho advance in the amount of work it is doing in the atomic energy field and through which it is a major contributor to the U.S. leadership in atomic energy.

Therefore, it is most encouraging to read the brief comment in the committee report on this subject, as follows:

> The committee recognizes that large sums have been spent on this program and that it is difficult to determine whether to more actively pursue the direct cycle or the indirect cycle. The committee is advised that the program will be reviewed by the Department of Defense during the year, to determine the military feasibility of one cycle or the other. In the meantime, the committee believes the full amount of the estimate should be available, to allow the Commission to pursue this program without limitation.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BARTLETT in the chair). Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I want to take a few moments today to say again what a very fine job the chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee, Senator HAYDEN, the subcommittee chairman, Senator ELLENDER, and the other members of the committee have done in promoting the economic development of the Nation's natural resources. The many programs carried on by the Corps of Army Engineers and the Bureau of Reclamation are largely responsible for this progress. The senior Senator from Arizona has again shown great foresight in attacking the problems of the West—irrigation, flood control, recreation, and power generation.

Montana does well in this money bill, and I am especially pleased that the Senate committee has concurred in the House action in providing $2,500,000 to begin construction on Yellowtail Dam, in southeastern Montana. This is a very important project, a large development with multipurpose benefits. The committee's recommendation will be joyously received in Montana and neighboring Wyoming. I do hope that the Bureau of Reclamation will be able to proceed with preliminary construction work and site preparation at an early date.

Last year the Congress provided funds to begin preliminary work and necessary rail and highway relocation in the vicinity of the East Bench unit in southwestern Montana. This year the budget request of $2,800,000 will enable the Bureau to proceed with the first year of major construction on this irrigation project.

The Senate committee recommendation of $565,000 for the Helena Valley unit will permit work to proceed toward the completion of this project.

The $336,000 allowed by the House for the Bureau of Reclamation will permit detailed investigation of the Jefferson unit, Missouri River Basin project. The unit involves storage regulation of the Big Hole River at the Reichle Reservoir site, and will irrigate approximately 47,500 acres of new land and 15,100 acres of supplemental lands. The lands proposed for irrigation occur in a number of tracts extending along both sides of the Jefferson River and the Missouri River between Twin Bridges and Canyon Ferry Reservoir, in Montana. Both Senator MURRAY and I are pleased that the Senate committee has also approved this nonbudgeted item.

The Senate committee has included several items of great interest to Montana, which were not included in the bill as sent here from the House. The Bureau of Reclamation's basin report on the Three Forks division indicated some favorable findings concerning the West Bench unit; and I am most pleased that the committee has recommended an additional $80,000 for the Bureau's investigation program, so that a more detailed study of this project can be undertaken.

In the State of Montana there is considerable interest, especially at the State college in Bozeman, concerning the need for controlling evaporation. I am in complete agreement with the $100,000 increase provided for the Bureau's program of engineering research on evaporation reduction, which will supplement programs in Montana and Arizona.

Mr. President, the major program under the Corps of Army Engineers, insofar as Montana is concerned, is the continued construction of the second powerplant at the Fort Peck Dam. This project is nearing completion, and I understand that two power units will go into service by the end of 1961.

When both Senator MURRAY and I appeared before the Subcommittee on Public Works Appropriations, we discussed the possibility of developing the Missouri River above Fort Peck Dam, in Montana. This project is a product of the vision and pioneering spirit of Montana's senior Senator in the field of water-resource development. He has spearheaded this project, one which I and the other members of the Montana delegation shall continue to pursue in line with his recommendations. Preliminary estimates indicate that a potential of 600,000 kilowatts is awaiting development between Fort Peck and Great Falls.

This work is under the jurisdiction of the Corps of Army Engineers, and the inclusion of $40,000 in this money bill will enable them to proceed with the very important studies.

Mr. President, again I wish to say how much the people of Montana and I appreciate the fine work being done by our colleagues, the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] and the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER]. They are truly great friends of the West.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, I know I express the feeling of the people of my State, as well as my own feeling, when I say that we are very grateful for the consideration the committee has given us in connection with our problems in regard to floods and the development of our resources. The chairman of the subcommittee and its other members—particularly the ranking Republican member, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG]—have given us great consideration. The committee maintained all the requests made by the budget and supported the action of the House in adding to the budget $100,000 for planning for No. 2 Green Reservoir; and I am very grateful that the committee included the sum of $300,000 to initiate construction of Fishtrap Reservoir, on the Big Sandy. The subcommittee heard the evidence in regard to the floods which have swept the valley of the Big Sandy for 100 years. The chairman and the other subcommittee members gave to those who came from that area a great deal of consideration, and I wish to express my thanks for the inclusion of this amount. I know the Senator will do his best to maintain it in the conference.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I hope the Senate will reject the amendment of the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARTKE], because, I repeat, we have provided $3,225,000 more than the budget. If we can keep that amount, we shall have ample funds.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARTKE].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARTKE. Mr. President, I offer the amendments which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 4, in line 15, it is proposed to strike out "$737,884,600" and insert in lieu thereof "$738,208,600".

On page 5, line 1, after the colon, it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided further, That of the funds herein provided for "Construction, General" not less than $300,000 shall be available for construction of the Mason J. Niblack levee, not less than $495,000 shall be available for planning and construction of the Salamonie Reservoir, and not less than $100,000 shall be available for planning and construction of the Sugar Creek levee, all in the State of Indiana:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana desire to have his amendments considered en bloc?

Mr. HARTKE. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that will be done.

Mr. HARTKE. Mr. President, these amendments will do what was suggested earlier; namely, come down to specific projects for Indiana. The amendments would increase the amount appropriated up to the stated capabilities of the Corps of Engineers. The amendments would remove the shackles, so to speak, and would get the flood-control program under way.

I realize that my distinguished friend has done a magnificent job in the committee. But very shortly the foreign-aid bill will be before us. At that time I wonder whether I then shall hear the same Senators exercise the same degree of concern in regard to how we are going to spend our money. Of course I am not opposed to that program; I should like to see it carried out. But I wonder whether the same Senators will then express the same concern about the situation, in reverse—in other words, whether they will express the same concern for the welfare of the people overseas that they have expressed for the welfare of the people in this country, and whether they then will say that an orderly job is being done, and that the work does not need to be accelerated, and that what is now being done is all that we can do.

If this is all that we can do, we had better examine our capacity to survive as a Nation, because if we cannot do this job in order to preserve our natural resources, even in accordance with the stated capabilities of the Army Engineers, then soon we shall not even be able to dream or think up to the level of what heretofore we have been able to do.

Mr. President, at this time I withdraw the amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana has that right; and the amendments are withdrawn.

The bill is open to further amendment.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I understand that the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] desires to offer an amendment.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 4, in line 5, it is proposed to strike out, "$737,884,600", and to insert "$737,859,600".

On page 4, in line 20, after the colon, it is proposed to insert:

Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be used for levee unit No. 5, Wabash River, Indiana:.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I am pleased to know that the chairman of the subcommittee is in such an amiable mood this evening and that he has his characteristic zeal for economy.

I do not wish to labor this point again at great length, for I think perhaps in the course of the previous debate the Members of the Senate have learned of the issues at stake.

It is true that the bill in its present form provides both for an appropriation on the Indiana side of the Wabash River, for the planning of specific levees, and that it also provides an appropriation for a survey as to whether levees should be built on the Illinois side.

This means, in effect—if we view the matter from the standpoint of a race between two sister States, although I do not like to consider the matter in that way—that the State of Indiana, which already has crept a mile ahead of Illinois, is given another quarter of a mile. But we in Illinois are at the post, and we are given a start of about 100 yards. So the differential advantage of Indiana over Illinois is increased.

I stand for equal protection of the land on both sides of the Wabash River. It was a shame that the Indiana people got levees at Vincennes, with no corresponding levees on the Illinois side, with the result that many thousands of acres of Illinois land are flooded each year, because of the Indiana levees. We do not want that to happen on the lower Wabash or at any other place on the Wabash.

I think what probably should be done is to have a levee built to protect the city of Mount Carmel, and to have a corresponding levee built on the other side, to protect the lands on the Indiana side.

But my good friends from Indiana are really "putting something over" on us when they are promoting the construction of a levee farther south on their side, when there are no real prospects for the construction of a corresponding levee on our side.

So I hope very much that the very amiable and economical chairman will accept this amendment, which will save $25,000 and will preserve equality of treatment to the land on both sides of the river.

If that is not done, I think I should serve notice that we will fight to the death any appropriation for construction money for a levee on one side, if it is not accompanied by a corresponding levee on our side. This is not a declaration of war; but it is a declaration of intent and purpose.

I ask unanimous consent that a statement which I have prepared on this subject be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF SENATOR PAUL H. DOUGLAS IN OPPOSITION TO APPROPRIATION OF $25,000 FOR LEVEE UNIT NO. 5, WABASH RIVER PLANNING IN H.R. 12326

I hope very much that the able subcommittee chairman, Senator ELLENDER, and the Senate will be willing to remove from this bill the appropriation of $25,000 for preconstruction planning work on levee unit No. 5, Wabash River, Ind.

PROJECT WILL FLOOD ILLINOIS LANDS

The reason for my opposition is the grave danger that this levee project to protect some Indiana land from floods would greatly increase the flooding and damage in Mount Carmel, Ill., and in the farmlands in Wabash County, Ill., downstream from Mount Carmel. I have had many urgent appeals from Illinois people against this project. They are alarmed about these dangers. They have established a Wabash County Flood Protection Committee under the able leadership of Mayor Harry C. Miller, of Mount Carmel, and Leonard W. Koger, Jr., its chairman.

INDIANA OBJECTORS ARE PRESSING LAWSUIT AGAINST DISTRICT

A large number of Indiana residents are also objecting, and the legality of the levee unit No. 5 is itself being contested in the Indiana courts. The pendency of this litigation is another reason to withhold further spending now.

ILLINOIS SURVEY FUNDS DO NOT BALANCE OFF INDIANA PLANNING APPROPRIATION

I understand and appreciate the committee's desire to be completely fair and helpful to the interests of the Illinois as well as the Indiana residents, for it has also included in the appropriation for surveys an item of $15,000 for a study of the Wabash River at Mount Carmel. This would go into the feasibility of protective works on the Illinois side across from levee unit No. 5.

But the survey holds little promise for the Illinois interests, because of the negative findings in such a preliminary study by the Engineers back in 1948. And the planning money for the Indiana levee unit poses an imminent threat because that project was authorized way back in 1936. If pushed closer to the point of readiness for construction, as the appropriation in this bill would push it, there is a prospect that work would go ahead on the Indiana side much sooner and serious doubt about whether Illinois can ever, or will ever, get protection from the resulting higher and more frequent flood levels.

I would gladly support funds for a survey of desirable levees on the Illinois side to protect Mount Carmel, and appropriate levees across the way on the Indiana side to be sure the Illinois protective works did not worsen conditions on the Indiana side—and to give Indiana parallel and equal protection. But I believe the proposal in this bill which gives Indiana priority protection at the expense of Illinois should be deleted.

This would give time and opportunity for a fuller hearing of the grounds of opposition to the levee unit by the committee next year and a better balancing by the committee of the various Illinois and Indiana interests that would be injured and benefited before the levee unit is pushed to the point of starting construction.

It would also allow a related consideration of the flood control effects of various upstream reservoir proposals, some already authorized and others being studied as a part of the overall Wabash River Valley survey.

It would also enable the litigation concerning levee unit No. 5 to be determined by the Indiana courts before more Federal funds are appropriated.

Let me outline somewhat more fully the objections to this project which I have mentioned.

OBJECTIONS OUTLINED

1. Pending Indiana litigation makes appropriation now premature

The proponents of levee unit No. 5 and the brief report of the Engineers (Senate hearings, p. 2710) leave the impression that the legality of the levee unit is finally determined. But this is not the case.

It is true that a court order setting up the district was entered on September 23, 1959. But 104 petitioners, residents of Indiana, filed a complaint to review that judgment on December 22, 1959, and that complaint is pending in the Gibson County circuit court. It is docket No. 11,535. The title of the case is Margaret B. Brown and Mark W. Lowell, Trustees, Birdie R. Gray, Trustee and Others v. Stephen A. Blood and Others.

I understand a special judge, Hon. Joe A. Lowdermilk, has been appointed by the Supreme Court of Indiana to hear and try the issues.

The last reported action in the case was a motion by some of the principal defendants on June 23, 1960, for a continuance to give them time to file their answer before August. At last account that answer was not filed. If this answer is filed before September, presumably the case could be heard in September.

But the length of that hearing is difficult to guess, and the expressed determination of the petitioning objectors to carry this case to the Indiana Supreme Court if necessary makes it clear that no early, final decision is probable or possible. The seriousness with which these legal objections are being urged in Indiana is evidenced by the 880-page length of the petition, the large number of petitioners, 104, who have joined in the action; and their decision to exercise their full legal rights of appeal if necessary to block a project they strongly oppose.

I am confident the committee might have reached a different conclusion about this appropriation at this time, had these facts been outlined to it more fully. Surely it would be improvident to spend Federal funds even for planning in connection with a levee district which may be ruled out by action of the Indiana State courts.

2. Building this levee would flood other lands

The more substantial basis of opposition to levee unit No. 5, even if the legal objections are later removed, however, is the severe damage this new levee will inflict on other lands.

Illinois property owners have already had such an experience as a result of the building of levees on the Wabash below Vincennes. Illinois landowners there have had to give up their farms, and the threats to Wabash County farmers below Mount Carmel and to Mount Carmel are even more serious.

In their comments supplied to the Senate Appropriations Committee, the Corps of Engineers frankly conceded in brief and general terms the damaging results that the building of levee unit No. 5 will have. These comments state (Senate hearings, p. 2710):

"The Corps of Engineers recognizes that the construction of levee unit No. 5 will increase the flood level at Mount Carmel, the frequency of damaging floods and the annual average flood damage in Wabash County, Ill., the extent of which would be determined during the course of a study."

But these elements of damage to Mount Carmel and Illinois farmlands downriver have been much more carefully detailed by Mr. Leonard M. Koger, Jr., chairman of the Wabash County Flood Protection Committee, in his statement to the Senate Appropriations Committee. He estimates the damages to Illinois business and farm property values to aggregate $6 million.

Let me list his well-documented conclusions. He indicates that the construction of levee unit No. 5 will:

1. Create an immediate and serious flood threat to one-third of the area in the incorporated city limits of Mount Carmel and to over 12,000 acres of farm and rural property in Wabash County, Ill.

2. Increase flood level by five feet at the highest stage at which confinement will be operative.

3. Increase the frequency of major floods of a 27-foot stage (10 feet above flood stage) to an average of one every four years instead of the prevailing frequency of one every 11 years.

4. Increase the frequency of disastrous floods of the nature of the 31 foot flood in 1913 from one in 47 years to an average of seven in 100 years.

5. Cause the annual average flood damage in Wabash County to increase approximately 100 percent.

6. Create a serious threat to the general health and welfare in the city of Mount Carmel if the increased flow of flood waters causes the water treating plant and sewerage plant to become inoperative and force the shutdown of the electric generating and gas distribution facilities of the local company.

7. Create an unfavorable climate of the industrial development of the area and will tend to discourage expansion of industry already located in the area.

8. Cause an immediate decrease in the value of residential, industrial and agricultural property to the extent of $6 million as shown by intervening petitions filed by Illinois property owners.

9. Cause floodwaters to remain longer on and move more rapidly across agricultural land reducing soil fertility by water logging and erosion.

For the fuller information of the Members of the Senate—and of conferences, should this go to conference—I include at this point the full text of Mr. Koger's statement:

Opposition to Appropriation of Funds for Indiana Levee Unit No. 5

(Statement of Leonard M. Koger, Jr., chairman, Wabash County Flood Protection Committee, Wabash County, Ill., before Committee on Appropriations, U.S. Senate, Apr. 27, 1960)

The Wabash County Flood Protection Committee came into existence in August 1956, when certain Indiana property owners were petitioning Indiana Gibson County circuit court to create levee district No. 5 preparatory to seeking Federal funds for construction of Indiana levee unit No. 5 on the Indiana side of the Wabash River. Indiana levee unit No. 5 received congressional authorization under a Flood Control Act adopted June 22, 1936.

This committee was created for the express purpose of opposing all efforts to consummate the construction of levee unit No. 5 in Indiana, opposite Mount Carmel and Wabash County, Ill. The committee represents several hundred property owners in Mount Carmel and Wabash County. Among the groups supporting the work of this committee are industrial plants, including a large paperboard factory, a lumber company, a sand and gravel company, a grain elevator, a farm implement company, and an electric and gas company. There are small business establishments supporting the committee. It has the backing of the city council of Mount Carmel, the Mount Carmel Chamber of Commerce and the county board of commissioners. Civic organizations of the area support the committee's work, as well as the county farm bureau organization, and other groups.

The Wabash County Flood Protection Committee has been active during the past 4 years alerting residents of Wabash County to the potential and inherent dangers which come with construction of a levee such as the one proposed opposite their community. The committee has also helped those property owners, both individuals and business establishments, file over 325 intervening petitions in Gibson County circuit court remonstrating to the formation of the levee district.

Wabash County, located in the southeasterly part of Illinois on the right bank of the Wabash River, is one of the smallest counties in the State. The county covers an area of nearly 220 square miles and has a population of approximately 15,000. The area is predominently agricultural with 85 percent of the land devoted to crops, pasture, and woodland. The soil in the county is rich and productive, yielding wheat, hay, oats, vegetables, and providing abundant food for livestock. Since 1939, numerous oil wells have appeared in many parts of the county and millions of barrels of oil have been pumped from the still productive area.

The normal average temperature in Wabash County is 56° F. with an average maximum and minimum of 78° for July and 32° for January. Recorded temperature extremes are 112° above and 22° below zero. The normal annual precipitation in Wabash County is 42 inches.

Mount Carmel, the county seat of Wabash County, has a population of approximately 10,000. Other smaller communities in the county are Allendale, Keensburg, Bellmont, Lancaster, Cowling, Friendsville, and Patton. Wabash County has for its eastern boundary approximately 40 miles of Wabash River bank.

Mount Carmel lies opposite the mouths of the White and Patoka Rivers which empty into the parent stream from the east bank at Wabash River miles 95.6 and 94.6, respectively. Mount Carmel is laid out on a square street pattern and covers an area of approximately 1,285 acres along a bluff which fringes the lowlands adjacent to the right bank of the river. About one-third of the city area, 410 acres, is located in the flood plain. Development in this area is primarily industrial and residential. Industrial establishments include sand and gravel works, lumberyard, grain elevator, paper company, logging operation, and farm implement company as well as local electric and gas plant, city water intake, city pumping station, and city sewerage plant.

The Wabash River gage is located on the property of the local electric and gas company and daily records are kept by that organization. The gage location is approximately 94.5 river miles above the mouth of the Wabash River. The gage zero elevation at this point is 371.46 feet above sea level and the flood stage is 17 feet. The maximum stage within the period of record for this gage is 31 feet which was measured on March 30, 1913. The maximum discharge measurement at this point is 279,000 cubic feet per second and the minimum is 2,060 cubic feet per second. The estimated average annual runoff volume is 17,548,000 acre-feet, or 11.51 inches depth over the drainage basin above Mount Carmel. This volume corresponds to an average discharge of 24,800 cubic feet per second.

There are no records to indicate the March 1913 flood has ever been exceeded at Mount Carmel. The following chart gives the dates and stages for the major floods experienced in Wabash County:

In Wabash County agricultural losses resulting from flood damage for the year 1957 amounted to $300,000. Over 10,000 acres of land were involved. In 1958, the estimated amount of flood damages for the county was $375,000, involving approximately 12,000 acres.

Flood damage in the urban area of Mount Carmel begins when the river stage reaches 23 feet. Serious damage begins at the stage of 27 feet. At the 27½-foot stage floodwater covers the railroad siding on the property of the electric company making impossible the delivery of coal which is necessary for electric generation. The same stage is critical to a large paper manufacturing plant located in the same area, as well as the sand and gravel company, lumberyard and sewerage plant. At a 31-foot flood stage the city water plant becomes inoperative.

These industries have located on the flood plains of the Wabash River for essentially two good reasons. (1) The need for water transportation as in the case of the sand and gravel operations, which also obtains its raw material from the bed of the river. (2) The need for large volumes of water for cooling and processing purposes. Both the large paperboard manufacturing concern and the electric generating company mentioned previously use vast amounts of water for these purposes.

It is true anyone building in such an area should expect to contend with the natural or regulated flood flow of water. These industries have taken precautions to mitigate against natural floods, but they are not prepared to suffer losses through increased flows and flood heights caused by acts of others. Nor should they be required to do so.

The flood risk in the past has had very little effect on industrial property values. It is admitted that possibility of flooding may have served to depress residential property values and probably has prevented, to some extent, normal repairs and maintenance.

Flood warning in ample time to permit the safe evacuation of persons from the flood plain is normally possible due to the slowly rising flood hydrograph. Consequently, loss of life from floods is improbable and there is no record or recollection of any loss of life in the county due to floods. Neither does the record indicate there has ever been an epidemic attributable to the floods.

Records of the average annual direct and indirect flood damages are not available for the city of Mount Carmel. In a report made by the Department of Army, Corps of Engineers, Louisville district, April 15, 1948, the average annual direct and indirect damages for the flooding conditions at that time were estimated to be $17,300 and $4,900, respectively, in terms of 1948 dollars.

Mount Carmel and the adjacent rural areas in the county have no flood protection. Congress has authorized no flood protection projects for the area. However, Congress has authorized the construction of an agricultural levee on the Indiana side of the Wabash River.

The project known as levee unit No. 5 is located in Gibson and Posey Counties, Indiana, on the left bank of the Wabash River opposite Mount Carmel and Wabash County. The plan involves the construction of an earth levee system which would provide protection for approximately 45,000 acres of Indiana land against a flood equal to that having an average frequency of 7 times in 100 years. This project received congressional authorization by the Flood Control Act adopted on June 22, 1936. The estimated cost of the work is approximately $10 million for construction and over $600,000 for land and damages.

Indiana landowners began the necessary steps to form the required levee district several years ago. This first attempt resulted in an adverse Indiana Supreme Court decision. Again in 1956 the Indiana interests initiated the formal court proceedings necessary to establish the levee district which would be the authority responsible for operation and maintenance of the levee. The petition requesting the Gibson County Circuit Court to establish the levee district was signed by five large landowners of Gibson and Posey Counties. In their petition they set out the physical facts of the levee. These physical dimensions are identical to levee plans previously submitted by the Corps of Army Engineers, Louisville district.

Levee unit No. 5 is described as an earth levee with an average height of 11 feet, an average base width of 78 feet, and a crown width of 12 feet. The proposed levee is 45.2 miles long and designed to protect some 45,000 acres of land. The levee begins at a point approximately 3 miles southwest of Patoka, Ind. From that point the levee will carry west along the south bank of the Patoka River for approximately 8 miles. There, where the Patoka flows into the Wabash directly opposite Mount Carmel, the levee turns toward the south and runs along the left or east bank of the Wabash River following it to the point where the Black River empties into the Wabash. From there the levee traverses up the northerly bank of the Black River in a northeasterly direction to a point known as Johnson. It is interesting to note that of the 45,000 acres of land the levee will protect, over one-third is owned or controlled by only a few landowners.

The top of the levee opposite Mount Carmel will be at an elevation of 404½ feet above sea level. In order to top the levee the flood crest will reach 33 feet on the Mount Carmel river gage. This is somewhat higher than the record 1913 flood. The Corps of Army Engineers terms the levee a 15-year levee, indicating it will be overrun on an average of once every 15 years. According to testimony of Mr. S. M. Bailey, Chief, Engineering Division, U.S. Army Engineer district, Louisville, during a hearing held relative to the formation of Levee District No. 5, when the levee is overrun a portion of it will be washed away and would afford no protection. Such condition would prevail on the average of once every 15 years. Mount Carmel has not experienced such a flood for over 47 years.

The engineers also state that under the conditions of confinement created by the levee the 23-foot stage (the stage at which damage begins in Wabash County) would be equaled or exceeded on the average of once every 1½ years or about the same as under present conditions of stream confinement. Also, according to Mr. Bailey, under conditions of confinement produced by construction of the levee it is estimated the increase for the highest stage at which confinement will be operative, or the maximum increase, will be 5 feet. Major floods having a stage of 27 feet would be equaled or exceeded on the average of about once every 4 years as compared to once every 11 years under the present conditions of confinement. It is estimated that the average annual flood damage would be slightly over twice the estimated damage without confinement.

Although the flood plains in the eastern portion of Wabash County are somewhat defined because of the abrupt increase of elevation at the edge of the flood plain, confinement created by the proposed Indiana levee would tend to have disastrous effects on agricultural and urban property in the Illinois flood plain. Not only would the frequency of major floods increase but the floodwaters would remain standing on agricultural land for a greater length of time. At the same time the current of the stream would increase considerably thereby causing scouring and erosion of the agricultural land. Crop losses caused by the overflow onto Illinois farmland would make the soil incapable of being farmed in an efficient and husbandmanlike manner. Such conditions would force eventual abandonment of acreage as tillable land.

In the vicinity of Rochester, Ill., there is now a structure known as Rochester-McCleary Bluffs levee designed to protect a portion of the agricultural land in the south part of Wabash County. This levee, constructed at the expense of the landowners protected by it, would be greatly endangered if proposed levee unit No. 5 on the opposite side of the river were built.

Property owners in Mt. Carmel and Wabash County fear the construction of the proposed levee unit No. 5 will cause great economic loss. Soon after proceedings began in Gibson County circuit court, requesting establishment of the levee district, hundreds of Mount Carmel and Wabash County residents filed intervening petitions opposing such action. In these intervening petitions the opponents of the levee swore the value of their property would be decreased to the extent of some $6 million if the proposed levee were constructed. In 1958 Special Judge Lester Nixon, of the Gibson County circuit court, held that the court had no jurisdiction to hear the objections of the Illinois residents. Therefore, Wabash County property owners are without recourse in the Indiana proceedings. Many Indiana residents outside the levee, and on the north side of the Patoka River, as well as pipeline and oil companies continue to oppose the formation of the levee district.

As of this date, the formation of the levee district for Indiana levee unit No. 5 is still in litigation in the Gibson County circuit court. So long as this question is still before the court it would seem questionable as to whether Congress would want to appropriate further funds for surveys, studies, detailed planning or actual construction, if it were aware of this fact.

Throughout the long and vigorously contested court proceedings it has been apparent that Illinois landowners will not be awarded compensation for the $6 million damages they will suffer if the authorized levee is constructed. The court has held it has no jurisdiction to hear the intervening petitions and the claims for damages of Illinois property owners. It follows that at the same time it would have no jurisdiction to award damages to those same property owners.

An organization known as the Wabash Valley Association has actively promoted development of the Wabash Valley in Illinois and Indiana. That group has comprehensive plans for making the Wabash navigable and for flood control along the valley. Included in their proposals are plans for construction of several reservoirs in the upper reaches of the Wabash River. Appropriations have been provided by the Federal Government for construction of some of these. It could be that reservoirs such as these will alleviate some part of the flood problem in the lower reaches of the Wabash. To build a levee such as unit No. 5 in Posey and Gibson Counties in Indiana before the upper reservoirs are built and before their effectiveness is determined, seems to be premature. However, the Indiana interests with the backing of the Wabash Valley Association continue to seek appropriations for levee unit No. 5 in Indiana.

In the first session of this Congress, the House of Representatives did not deem it necessary to make further appropriations for this levee. The situation and conditions have not changed since last year. It would appear that the same wise decisions to omit funds for this levee again in this session would be justifiable.

In a report dated April 15, 1948, of a survey made by the Corps of Engineers, Louisville district, the question of flood protection for Mount Carmel and the adjacent rural area was discussed. It was the conclusion of that group that protection for only a small portion of Mount Carmel could be economically justified but it would not prove feasible to protect with agricultural levees the great rural portion of Wabash County which lies opposite the proposed Indiana levee unit No. 5.

If the Indiana levee is not constructed, there is no need to build a levee in Illinois. There is no need then to place the burden of construction costs on all the taxpayers, and the financial responsibility of maintaining and operating an unnecessary levee on the local people.

This committee, speaking for a vast number of individuals, businessmen, civic organizations, local governing bodies and others, respectfully requests that the Appropriations Committee give due consideration to its plea for deletion from the appropriation bill any and all funds designated for further study, planning or construction of Indiana levee No. 5.

Summary

The Wabash County Flood Protection Committee urges opposition to appropriation of funds for Indiana levee unit No. 5 for the following reasons.

The construction of Indiana levee unit No. 5 will:

1. Create an immediate and serious flood threat to one-third of the area in the incorporated city limits of Mount Carmel and to over 12,000 acres of farm and rural property in Wabash County, Ill.

2. Increase flood level by 5 feet at the highest stage at which confinement will be operative.

3. Increase the frequency of major floods of a 27-foot stage (10 feet above flood stage) to an average of one every 4 years instead of the prevailing frequency of one every 11 years.

4. Increase the frequency of disastrous floods of the nature of the 31-foot flood in 1913 from one in 47 years to an average of seven in 100 years.

5. Cause the annual average flood damage in Wabash County to increase approximately 100 percent.

6. Create a serious threat to the general health and welfare to the city of Mount Carmel if the increased flow of floodwaters causes the water treating plant and sewerage plant to become inoperative and force the shutdown of the electric generating and gas distribution facilities of the local company.

7. Create an unfavorable climate for the industrial development of the area and will tend to discourage expansion of industry already located in the area.

8. Cause an immediate decrease in the value of residential, industrial, and agricultural property to the extent of $6 million as shown by intervening petitions filed by Illinois property owners.

9. Cause floodwaters to remain longer on and move more rapidly across agricultural land reducing soil fertility by waterlogging and erosion.

Since Indiana courts will assume no jurisdiction over Illinois property, Illinois landowners will not be compensated for damages resulting from the construction of the Indiana levee.

The question of the formation of levee district No. 5 is still in the process of contested litigation and the outcome of the suit remains to be determined.

There are other flood abatement projects upstream in the Wabash River Valley, which when completed may make the construction of levee No. 5 unnecessary.

When considering the ratio of benefits to costs for the project, the costs used for such computation did not include costs represented by damages suffered by Illinois property owners.

According to the report of the 1948 survey conducted by the U.S. Corps of Engineers it is not economically feasible to protect the rural areas adjacent to Mount Carmel with levees. There has been no substantial change in the physical problem since that time. There is no reason to believe the rural areas could be protected more economically now than previously.

This committee questions the wisdom of spending large amounts of money for projects which increase the agricultural potential of certain favored land, at the expense of extensive damage to neighboring land, while other agencies of the Government are spending taxpayers' money to reduce the amount of land in crop production

This committee objects to and rebels at the idea that in order to pay for the construction of levee unit No. 5 Illinois taxpayers will contribute more funds toward the construction of the levee than will the Indiana taxpayers.

No appropriation was made during the last session of Congress for further study or planning on levee unit No. 5. Conditions have not changed since last year and certainly no appropriations are warranted again this year.

I have also received a statement presented by an Indiana landowner, Mr. John F. Hull, Sr., on May 24, 1960, before the National Rivers and Harbors Congress in opposition to the construction of Indiana levee unit No. 5. Although I believe Mr. Hull has been misinformed in reference to the costs of the essential relocation of railroad bridges and tracks resulting from this project and has somewhat overstated them, his general description of the project itself and of the effects of building up a levee wall which protects a roughly rectangular area of farmland, but thereby throws the water in larger quantities at more rapid flows and in greater depths on the lands opposite these levee walls both in Indiana and Illinois, is so clear and persuasive that I believe his facts will be helpful in the final determination of this issue.

I therefore include Mr. Hull's statement at this point in the RECORD.

Opposition to the Construction of Indiana Levee Unit No. 5

(Statement of John F. Hull, Sr., Gibson County Flood Protection, Gibson County, Ind., before National Rivers and Harbors Congress, May 24, 1960)

The speaker is a retired farmer from Patoka, Ind., here to represent an organized group of other farmers who own and/or operate 17,000 acres of land that would be adversely affected by the proposed Wabash Valley unit No. 5.

We protest the acceptance of the unit No. 5 project as a part of the Wabash Valley improvement program, and for the following reasons:

Wabash Valley levee unit No. 5 is not like unto other levees, to wit:

The prevailing concept of a levee is that it is a structure usually paralleling the bank of a stream; that it is a structure having comparatively little effect upon the stream flow it parallels; that it is designed to prevent the damaging spread of floodwaters that otherwise would jeopardize homesites, industrial sites, or agricultural lands; that the levee does little or no damage to others along the stream, but is of great benefit to those interests or people it is designed to protect; that its benefits greatly outweigh its costs, resulting in increased assets for the neighborhood, the State, and the whole national economy.

This Wabash Valley unit No. 5 is not at all like until this concept, in this, to wit:

To explain why this unit is so very different, may we review with you the topography of the area in which the upper segments of this proposed levee are located, and very particularly we invite your attention to the 5- or 10-mile segment of the Wabash River that extends just above and below Mount Carmel, Ill.

The Wabash River draining most of the northern part of Indiana flows southward along the Indiana west line. Along the stretches of this river there is a flood plain. While this flood plain varies in width from mile to mile of its length, it tends to become wider and wider as its various tributaries add their volume to the flow, and their little flood plains to the greater one of the main stream. This flood plain sometimes is the same on either side of the stream. Sometimes, when the hills crowd the stream, the flood plain is almost entirely on the opposite side of the river from the hills. This is particularly the case in the Wabash Valley at this point at Mount Carmel, Ill., where the high land comes very close to the river's western edge, forcing the flood plain almost entirely over to the Indiana side.

You will notice on your map that at a point almost opposite to Mount Carmel, the Wabash is joined with its largest tributary, the White River. This White River, with its east and west forks, drains almost all of central Indiana, and almost exactly the same pattern of flood plains appears down the tributaries of the White River, carrying on with a wider and wider flood plain to its mouth near Mount Carmel. Please note that this great addition to the flood plain of the Wabash River at this river junction occurs on the Indiana side. Please note further that at a point one-half mile down stream from the confluence of the Wabash and White Rivers, the Patoka River joins the Wabash. This river joins the Wabash just north, and upstream from the first, or the east-west leg of the proposed levee.

This Patoka River, which drains the southern part of the State, has a similar flood plain pattern as the other rivers, except that its flood plain is much smaller.

It can be seen that at this point of juncture of these three rivers just north of the proposed location of levee No. 5 we have really a mighty river that drains almost all of Indiana, and a good portion of Illinois; that it has a great flood plain and that the flood plain at this point is almost entirely on the Indiana side.

I take it that it is understood that a flood plain is that area of relatively low land lying along the course of a stream over which the streamflow will pass at floodtime when the natural channel of the river cannot carry the volume of water caused by upstream floods.

If the picture of these converging flood plains has been clearly drawn, it will be seen that the flood plains of the Patoka and White Rivers at their mouth become the flood plains of the Wabash River.

Whereas in dry season the Patoka and White Rivers flow westerly to the channel of the Wabash, in flood stage these rivers both empty on the flood plain of the Wabash, and much of their water turns south, pouring across this 10-mile-wide flood plain, becoming the stream of the Wabash River.

It is across this flood plain, or stream of the Wabash River, that the advocates of levee No. 5 propose to build a dam across seven-eighths of this channel. This amazing proposition makes levee unit No. 5 not like unto any other levee proposal.

When one is as far away from this proposed levee site as Washington, D.C., the preceding statements may seem like theorizing. Let us then turn to concrete, specific engineering data as are furnished by studies of the U.S. Engineers.

During a flood period of the Wabash River in 1943, from May 15 to June 2, at a point exactly in the area of flood plain we are discussing, the U.S. Engineers took daily measurements of waterflow in depth and velocity and reported their measurements in cubic feet per second, flow and discharge. They reported the volume within the channel as "channel discharge," and the volume passing over the flood plain as "over bank flow." This complete data may be secured from the office of the U.S. Engineers at Louisville, Ky., or from the expert testimony given in case 9927, tried in the Gibson circuit court, at Princeton, Ind.; or it can be had in like testimony presented in case 11,535 now pending in the Gibson circuit court.

May we point out before setting out excerpts of this data that it discloses the fact that the percentage of riverflow that goes down the flood plain rises from zero in normal flow to much more than 50 percent in very high flood stage.

Quoting briefly: May 19, when the gage at Mount Carmel read 24.12 feet:

	Cubic feet per second
Channel discharge	108,500
Overbank discharge	46,800
Total discharge of the river	155,300

Then a few days later, when the Mount Carmel gage was 26.39 feet:

	Cubic feet per second
Channel discharge	126,000
Overbank discharge	132,000
Total discharge of the river	258,000

Note that when the flood deepened from 24.12 feet on the Mount Carmel gage to 26.39 feet, or a 2.27-foot increase in depth on the gage, the percentage changed from less than half of water flowing over the flood plain, to much more than half the discharge flowing outside the channel and over the flood plain.

It must be clear from these data that to build a dam at this point across seven-eighths of this channel flow creates a critical situation by raising the floodwaters phenomenally above the levee and by increasing the amount of current in what is left of the channel.

We regret that we cannot give at this point complete, competent, expert testimonial data of the exact magnitude of the resulting damming effect of this proposed levee on the great flood plain in Indiana or on the industrial area in Illinois.

The footwork of the attorneys for the petitioners in resisting any testimony as to this damming effect was brilliant. But, for that matter, both the engineers called in for the petitioners and the remonstrators were very reluctant to give specific figures. The reason for this reluctance is perfectly obvious on the face of it, the reason being that no two flood situations would ever be quite the same.

For instance, if flooding rains occurred in the Wabash area of northern Indiana and Illinois, the resulting height of the water of the flood plains would give one picture. If the flooding rains occurred in central Indiana over the east and west forks of the White River, the resulting flooding on the above-described flood plains would present another picture. If the flooding rains occurred in the southern portion of Indiana over the area drained by the Patoka River, the flood crests would present still another picture.

Then, still again, there would be, and has been, innumerable combinations of variants, not only of amounts of rainfall over these three areas, but combinations of variants in the amounts of water in these three rivers at the times when these rains occurred. This myriad of confusing data just about precluded any engineer from making pinpoint accurate statements about the damming effects in the flood plain or on its periphery.

But out of all this—claim and counterclaim—question—objection—or the if, and, or but statements, there did come a few bits of positive expert testimony. They are:

1. A statement by Mr. Samuel Bailey of the U.S. Engineers that levee unit No. 5 was designed to protect when the Wabash had a maximum discharge of 296,000 cubic feet per second.

2. That at a discharge of 296,000 cubic feet per second, the proposed levee would have a free board of only 1 foot.

3. That hydraulic studies of the Wabash flow were made in 1943 from May 15 to and including June 2 by the U.S. Engineers, constant reference was made to this report.

4. That in this report it was shown, when the Wabash flood crest stood at 27.11, the total Wabash discharge was 295,400 cubic feet per second, which is very close to the 296,000 cubic feet per second for which the levee No. 5 is designed to protect.

5. That the design for levee No. 5 is only for partial protection. For instance, this hydraulic report previously referred to shows that on May 25 the Wabash discharge was 307,000 cubic feet per second, which far and away overtops the 296,000 cubic feet per second for which the proposed levee is designed.

6. That after the construction of this levee, if there came a flood that reached the height of 33 feet on the Mount Carmel gage, the levee would be overtopped; and that a flood with a discharge similar to one of 28 feet on the Mount Carmel gage before construction, after construction would register 33 feet on the Mount Carmel gage.

7. That the proposed levee would have the effect of damming the Wabash stream. That when the flood of the Wabash reached a height for which this proposed levee was designed, 296,000 cubic feet per second discharge, the damming by the proposed levee would raise the flood level at Mount Carmel 5 feet.

8. That in direct testimony, question No. 115, to Mr. Charles Okey, hydraulic engineer of TVA, retired, when he was asked how much the design of the proposed levee No. 5 would need to be raised to contain a similar flood to the one of 1913, answered:

"If the levee were high enough to hold that flood located where the levee is in this plain about which we are talking, the added height would be in the neighborhood of 6 or 7 feet to carry the 1913 flood."

9. That the railroads whose lines cross this flood plain in the above-described area have been assured that their costs for raising fills, trestles, and bridges will be borne from the U.S. Treasury. The estimate of these costs submitted by the railroads is $8 million.

That the estimated cost of construction, without consideration for damages, would be $10 million.

That the total cost for this proposed partially protecting levee would be $18 million.

10. That the total acreage protected would be about 45,000 acres.

This project, levee No. 5, is really a spender's dream. It is apparent that if this $18 million can be secured for this levee, then a levee must be built to protect Mt. Carmel, Ill., and its environs—more millions. If these levees can then be secured, numbers who now are opposed will want levee protection on the Indiana side along the White and Patoka Rivers—still more millions.

A glance at the first enumerated items of testimony discloses that the levee is not even designed to give more than 3 or 4 years of protection. When the levee breaks and washes out, it must be repaired—more spending. When it is repaired, even those who now oppose it will clamor for a levee higher and stronger—more millions.

If it is made higher and stronger, then the railroads must be raised again—still more millions.

If proposed levee No. 5 is made higher, then the protective levee in Illinois, those in Indiana in Gibson County, and even the old Brevort Levee in Knox County, Ind., must be made higher and stronger—more and more millions of taxpayers' money to be poured into this bottomless pit, while good, practical construction projects up the valleys of these three rivers wait for funds.

Attention is invited to testimony items 6 and 7, where even the testimony of the petitioners admits that at a flood crest that gives a discharge of 296,000 cubic feet per second the flood level at Mount Carmel will be raised by an additional 5 feet. This figure of 5 feet is on the face of it a debatable estimate when this stream is dammed for seven-eighths of its width by building the proposed levee across the flood plain just south of the Patoka River.

This estimate becomes more than questionable if the levee must ultimately contain a discharge of 307,000 cubic feet per second (which is considerably below that of the flood of 1913) when the crest at Mount Carmel was 3.5 feet higher than it was May 25, 1943, when the discharge was 307,000 cubic feet per second.

But to pursue our studies of this proposed situation, let us take this new low figure of 5 feet and apply it over the flood plain above the proposed levee.

In a flood situation where the Wabash discharge at Mount Carmel was 296,000 cubic feet per second, and the rains had fallen up the Patoka River valley, then the pileup of floodwater would run up Main Street in the town of Patoka, Ind.

In a similar flood situation, but where the heavy rains have occurred in the central part of the State of Indiana, drained by the White River, then the flood pileup would flood the main street of Hazleton, Ind., and stand more than 2 feet deep in the Hazleton Consolidated School.

While these previously mentioned instances would be spectacular, they would be insignificant compared to the property damage all around the periphery of the before-described flood plain.

Since this country was settled, smart farm people have selected their homesites, their barnsites, cribs, and livestock shelters just as close as possible to these fertile flood plains, but high enough that they would be above overflow. Even a 5-foot upward lift of this flood crest would cost them and our society millions.

Attention is invited to testimony item 9, where it was given on highest authority that the Government would pick up the $8 million check for the railroads' costs on this project.

Once before petitioners tried to put over this project. Then we who were to be damaged had the cooperative help of the railroads. The project was defeated in the Supreme Court of Indiana. But this time the railroads apparently forsook us. During the second trial, when it was discovered that it was planned that the Government would pick up the check, we understood why we were forsaken.

Attention is called to item 10 of the testimony where it is stated that this levee No. 5 is designed to protect 45,000 acres. In this enclosure of 45,000 acres, there are about 6,000 acres that are high enough that they have never been covered by any flood in history; and there are in the enclosed area another 6,000 acres that are in roads, ditches, sloughs, and generally unplowable land.

There are probably 3,000 acres that lie close to the proposed levee around drains from this area that would probably be actually damaged by the levee which would hold this drainage water in while it is holding the floodwater out. (There are no pumps in this levee design.)

This would leave 30,000 acres that admittedly would be greatly benefited.

Few of us are naive enough to believe that this project would ultimately cost as little as $18 million. But if it did cost only $18 million, this would be a Federal cost of $600 per acre to improve the productivity of land at a time when the same Government is spending billions contending with surplus agricultural products.

Now, when so many worthwhile and constructive projects are being conceived in the Wabash Valley and its tributaries, projects that are not expensive; that would add so much to transportation, conservation of water resources and flood prevention—when there is such a wealth of these worthwhile projects, why should we ask to squander Indiana's limited share of these funds in such projects as Wabash levee No. 5?

On the basis of the clear statement by the Corps of Engineers to which I have referred and the clear proof offered by Illinois residents of Mount Carmel and in the Wabash Valley, I believe the threatened damages that would result from construction of levee unit No. 5 are so great as to warrant the withholding of the appropriation of the $25,000 included for the planning of that project in this bill.

3. Economic feasibility doubtful

Mr. Hull raises questions about the net feasibility of this project on the basis of his estimate that not much more than 30,000 acres as contrasted with the claimed 45,000 acres will be greatly benefited by levee unit No. 5. It is difficult to draw any firm conclusions from the testimony in the hearings on this point. But it seems to me clear that it deserves much more careful analysis and study. Even one of the principal proponents of this project, Mr. Thomas F. Mumford of Griffin, Ind., in his statement to the Senate Appropriations Committee (see hearings, p. 1739–41), concedes that there are only about 34,500 acres of cropland there in the total of some 43,200 acres that would be protected by the proposed levees.

The benefit-cost ratio claimed by the Corps of Engineers is only 1.6 to 1 (hearings, p. 2709), and if the damages to the Indiana land opposite the levees on the tributaries to the Wabash River are taken into account, along with the damage estimated at $6 million plus additional annual flooding damage to Mount Carmel and Illinois farm lands, I believe there may be very serious doubt whether the net benefits (the values created by the levee for Indiana lands less the damage caused to other Indiana lands and Illinois lands) is as great as the Engineers have estimated.

At least in the light of these substantial criticisms, I believe there should be more persuasive proof of economic feasibility before Congress appropriates further Federal funds, even for planning.

4. Will large landowners be main beneficiaries?

I have not found in the hearings any clear analysis of the farm interests that would benefit from this project. Mr. Mumford's statement claims "there are 679 individual persons who own land within the protected area." But reliable persons familiar with the situation there who have examined the documents in the pending court proceedings advise me that four or five family groups own over one-third of the total area to be protected by this $10 million project.

I certainly believe more definite information should be obtained about this before Congress commits the general taxpayers' money for this purpose.

5. Other flood control measures deserve prior study

According to my information, three reservoir projects, the Mississinewa, the Salamonie and the Huntington, have all been authorized. Two are on tributaries to the Wabash, the third is on the Wabash, all above the proposed levee unit No. 5. All would if built have some effect in retaining waters farther up the river and reducing floods at the point of this proposed project.

In addition, a more extensive survey is being made by the Corps of Engineers of all possible reservoir sites on the Wabash River generally, including some sites in Illinois.

Surely it would be folly to spend more Federal money now on planning for a flood control project the need for which may be greatly reduced, if not eliminated, by other flood control measures further upstream.

In conclusion, I wish merely to say that I have no animus against reasonable flood protection for my friends and neighbors in Indiana. But it is asking a little too much to ask Illinois residents to accept this meekly when such protective walls on one side of the Wabash will admittedly throw more water on and increase the flood damages inflicted on Illinois farmlands and the city of Mount Carmel, with its various industries and public facilities in the direct line of fire.

For all these reasons, I hope the Senate will at this time delete this appropriation of $25,000 for levee unit No. 5 and take a more careful look at the whole situation and the legitimate interests of Illinois residents before giving Federal funds for this planning or construction work to go ahead.

Mr. HARTKE. Mr. President, I rise to oppose the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois. I should like to repeat the statement made by the committee with reference to this project:

The committee considers this an important project that should be built at an early date.

The committee does not feel that the needed flood protection for levee unit No. 5, which was authorized in 1936, should be postponed indefinitely.

As I stated previously, this represents some 43,000 acres of some of the best cornland in Indiana. They have been wiped out 4 out of 5 years. If we do not get to this project pretty soon, we will not need to worry about it, because there will not be any farmers left in the area.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. President, the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] would like to be present, so I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further proceedings under the quorum call be suspended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS].

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I see no reason for eliminating this provision of the bill. It was given careful consideration by the committee. It is a part and parcel of the bill. The only argument in favor of eliminating it is that a levee is needed on the Illinois side of the river as well as the Indiana side, with which I agree 100 percent. But why delay construction of a levee on the Indiana side until the Illinois Senator gets around to introducing legislation providing for a levee on the Illinois side?

I hope the amendment is defeated. I have told the Senator from Illinois, publicly as well as privately, that I would support him at any time he would care to introduce a bill to build a levee on the Illinois side. I agree with him that one is needed. But the provisions of the bill do not call for constructing a levee on the Indiana side; they call for planning the levee, which means we shall have to come back next year and get an appropriation through this Congress to construct it.

This levee has been under consideration since 1936. I sincerely hope the able Senator from Illinois will withdraw his amendment, for the reason that I cannot conceive of one who is interested in developing levees and reservoirs in the Wabash River Basin, which covers both the Illinois and Indiana side, making such a proposal. As a Senator of the United States, I am just as much interested in the Illinois side as I am in the Indiana side.

This is a project as to which research has been approved by the Army Engineers. They have studied it; they have approved it. The provision we are talking about calls for spending money in connection with the possibility of a levee in and around Mount Carmel, Ill., which the able Senator from Illinois is discussing.

If the Senate starts eliminating appropriations for the planning of a levee which the committee has carefully studied, on the grounds that we must wait until somebody else is ready to make a similar proposal, then we never will build a levee and we never will build a reservoir and we will never get anywhere in the great development of our rivers, conserving our soil, and protecting our cities and farms.

I have no quarrel with the Senator from Illinois, except that I think he is mistaken in trying to stop something that he knows is right. I think he is 100 percent right in seeking to have levees on the Illinois side of the Wabash River. I am with him on that score. If there is any way we can make a provision for it in the bill we are considering tonight, I shall be very happy to support him, because he is 100 percent right.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAPEHART. I yield.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I congratulate the Senator on the conversion which he has undergone. He has apparently been baptized in the waters of the Wabash and has emerged a nobler and better man as a result.

But I point out that we have been flimflammed in the past by the State of Indiana, and I believe he was the moving spirit in getting the Wabash levee on the Indiana side, at Vincennes, with no corresponding levee on the Illinois side. The result was that thousands of acres of Illinois land have been damaged, while at the same time Indiana lands have been protected.

If the Senator has had a deep-seated change of heart and agrees that there should be no levee on the Indiana side unless there is a levee on the Illinois side, I will take it as a great improvement in character, and this will encourage me.

But, as I have said, since the State of Illinois has been flimflammed once, I do not propose to preside over the liquidation of thousands of additional acres of Illinois land; and I hereby serve notice that when we come to the appropriation bill next time, if there is an appropriation for constructing levees on the Indiana side without corresponding appropriations for levees on the Illinois side, we will fight in the fields, on the roads, and in the cities—paraphrasing Winston Churchill—for equality of treatment.

Mr. CAPEHART. No one is opposed to levees on the Illinois side. I will be very happy to vote for them. I think the Senate will be very happy to vote for them. I think what the able Senator from Illinois has to do is take a lesson from the Senators and Representatives from Indiana. We shall be glad to teach the Senator how to get an appropriation and how to get a levee. I shall be happy to vote with him. I shall be happy to assist the Senator in getting levees on the Illinois side of the Wabash River. I do not think Senators appreciate, however—I know I do not—coming in here at the last minute, after the committee has given careful consideration to this subject, and asking that an item be stricken out, on the theory that there should be a levee somewhere else along with this one. Why did not the able Senator appear before the committee? Why did not the Senator have plans drawn? Why did not the Senator propose that a similar levee be built on the Illinois side of the river? I am for the Senator on the project. I shall be happy to support him next year, and we will be able to get it through.

Mr. HARTKE. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator yield?

Mr. CAPEHART. I yield.

Mr. HARTKE. I should like to join my distinguished senior colleague from Indiana and say that we shall be more than delighted to accommodate the Senator from Illinois. We shall work with him. We shall vote with him. We shall talk with his constituents.

Mr. CAPEHART. Of course.

Mr. HARTKE. We shall help him to survey the levee scene or to do anything he wishes to have done.

Mr. CAPEHART. We shall be as happy to work as hard for a levee on the Illinois side of Mount Carmel as we are to work for one on the Indiana side. What more can we do?

Mr. DOUGLAS. This touching solicitude really wrings my heart. I am deeply touched by the nobility displayed by my colleagues from Indiana.

But if I may clear up a factual matter, my friend from Indiana taunted me about not having made an appearance before the Committee on Appropriations on this subject. I refer my friend to pages 2555 and 2556 of the record, at which I made a statement on this question and made my protest. I am very sorry my friend does not read the record and does not know what went on in the committee, but I made a full representation in this case.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I have the floor. I agree that the Senator made a protest against the Indiana levee, but the Senator did not take an affirmative stand as to getting a levee of his own.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will say that the person whom I introduced—namely, Leonard M. Koger, Jr., chairman, Wabash County Flood Protection Committee, Wabash County, Ill.—on pages 2538, 2539, 2540, and 2541 of the record presented a fully documented case in opposition. But authorizing legislation could not be presented to the Appropriations Committee.

My good friend from Indiana evidently has twinges of a guilty conscience, and he protests that he will reform in the future, but why should he not do so now? Why should he postpone his needed reformation until some time when it may be too late?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS].

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I merely wish to state that this question has been contested by Illinois citizens for some time. A suit was entered by people from Illinois in order to stop the formation of levee unit No. 5. On September 23, 1959, the Gibson County circuit court entered a judgment approving and confirming the assessments and declaring levee unit No. 5 established. It appears that this is a final judgment unappealed from and from which under every possible consideration the time for appeal, if any, has long expired.

As stated by my good friends from Indiana, this project was authorized in 1936. The committee gave it due consideration.

I wish to read at this time an excerpt from the committee report:

> Opposition has been expressed by local interests in Mount Carmel on the basis of the adverse effect the project would have on flood heights in the Mount Carmel area. The committee is informed that during the course of a previous investigation of the feasibility of levee protection along the Wabash, local interests were informed of the effect that the construction of levee unit No. 5 would have on the height of major floods. Local interests considered flood protection for Mount Carmel unnecessary at that time, but stated that they would reconsider the matter if the levees were constructed on the Indiana side.
> The budget estimate includes $10,000 for the continuation of the survey of the Wabash River, Mount Carmel. An additional $15,000 will be required after fiscal year 1961 for the completion of that study. The Corps of Engineers have stated that they have the capability of completing that study in fiscal year 1960 if an additional $15,000 were provided for fiscal year 1960.
> The committee does not feel that the needed flood protection for levee unit No. 5, which was authorized in 1936, should be postponed indefinitely. The committee has, therefore, recommended $25,000 planning funds for levee unit No. 5 for fiscal year 1961, and in addition recommends that $15,000 of the increase provided for surveys be applied to the study of the Wabash River at Mount Carmel.

Mr. President, I think a good case has been made for this project, and I think the committee acted wisely in providing the funds to initiate planning.

Mr. CAPEHART and Mr. DOUGLAS addressed the Chair.

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. CAPEHART. The able Senator from Illinois has made a fine case for getting all of us to assist him next year to get through the necessary appropriation to build a levee at Mount Carmel. I think the Senator has served his people well in that respect.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I thank the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I think the Senator from Louisiana unintentionally gave the impression that the legality of the levee unit No. 5 had been finally determined. This is the impression which the Corps of Engineers and the proponents of levee unit No. 5 try to give, but it is not the fact.

It is true that a court order setting up the district was entered on September 23, 1959. But 104 petitioners, residents of Indiana, filed a complaint to review that judgment on December 22, 1959, and that complaint is pending in the Gibson County circuit court. It is docket No. 11,535. The title of the case is Margaret B. Brown and Mark W. Lowell, Trustees, Birdie R. Gray, Trustee and Others against Stephen A. Blood and Others.

I understand a special judge, Hon. Joe A. Lowermilk, has been appointed by the Supreme Court of Indiana to hear and try the issues.

The last reported action in the case was a motion by some of the principal defendants on June 23, 1960, for a continuance to give them time to file their answer before August. At last account that answer was not filed. If this answer is filed before September, presumably the case could be heard in September.

But the length of that hearing is difficult to guess, and the expressed determination of the petitioning objectors to carry this case to the Indiana Supreme Court if necessary makes it clear that no early, final decision is probable or possible. The seriousness with which these legal objections are being urged in Indiana is evidenced by the 880 page length of the petition, the large number of petitioners, 104, who have joined in the action; and their decision to exercise their full legal rights of appeal if necessary to block a project they strongly oppose.

I am confident the committee might have reached a different conclusion about this appropriation at this time had these facts been outlined to it more fully. Surely it would be improvident to spend Federal funds even for planning in connection with a levee district which may be ruled out by action of the Indiana State courts.

Mr. ELLENDER. I will say to my good friend that I took the matter up with the Department of the Army, and under date of July 20, 1960, I received a letter from Col. Loren W. Olmstead, Corps of Engineers, Acting Director of Civil Works. In the letter he stated:

> The Gibson County circuit court, on September 23, 1959, ordered the levee district established. I am informed that the levee district was established after meeting all required legal conditions including observance of all requirements relative to the hearing of remonstrances from property owners involved. Subsequent to establishment of the levee district, a complaint was filed in Gibson County circuit court as docket No. 11535 on behalf of property owners who allegedly had an opportunity to remonstrate prior to establishment of the district. The court has not scheduled a hearing date on the complaint. Pending the hearing, there are no legal restrictions against the levee district proceeding with fulfillment of its purpose. Attorneys for the levee district advised our Louisville district, that they are of the opinion that there are no elements in the new complaint which are likely to upset the judgment establishing the levee district.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Do I correctly understand that the Corps of Engineers is now presuming to make a legal decision for the Supreme Court of Indiana?

Mr. ELLENDER. I am merely citing for the RECORD the information which I have, upon which I based the statement I made a moment ago.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Would not the chairman agree that additional funds should not be spent until the question of legality is decided?

Mr. ELLENDER. I think it has been decided, according to that letter. This question has been in litigation for some time, and I consider it a delaying tactic.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The issue is before the courts now. Only a tentative decision was reached last year. It is now being tested in a review proceeding. Obviously the Indiana Supreme Court regards this as a debatable question, because it has named a special judge to consider the subject.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, as I have said, the committee has given the question much study and has made its recommendation. I hope the amendment will be rejected.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to further amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the question is on engrossment of the amendments and the third reading of the bill.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill having been read the third time, the question is, Shall it pass? On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], the Senator from Alaska [Mr. GRUENING], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN], and the Senator from Texas [Mr. YARBOROUGH] are absent on official business.

I also announce that the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] is necessarily absent.

I further announce that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS] is absent because of illness.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL] is absent because of a death in his family.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], the Senator from Alaska [Mr. GRUENING], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN], and the Senator from Texas [Mr. YARBOROUGH] would each vote "yea."

Mr. KUCHEL. I announce that the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CASE] are necessarily absent.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. MARTIN] is absent by leave of the Senate on official business. If present and voting, the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CASE] would each vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 86, nays 0, as follows:

So the bill (H.R. 12326) was passed.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I move that the Senate insist on its amendments and request a conference thereon with the House of Representatives, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. ELLENDER, Mr. HAYDEN, Mr. RUSSELL, Mr. MCCLELLAN, Mr. ROBERTSON, Mr. HILL, Mr. MAGNUSON, Mr. HOLLAND, Mr. KERR, Mr. ANDERSON, Mr. DWORSHAK, Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota, Mr. MUNDT, and Mrs. SMITH conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Before I make a motion, I should like to pay my humble tribute to the very able Senator from Louisiana for his diligence and devotion and fairness in connection with one of the most difficult bills that ever comes before the Senate.

When a good many of us are enjoying recreation or are engaged in other activities, the Senator from Louisiana, morning, afternoon, and even in the evening, is holding hearings in connection with the civil functions appropriation bill. I know of no greater tribute that could be paid to him and his associates on the subcommittee, both majority and minority members, than the unanimous vote which this comprehensive appropriation bill received this evening.

I wish to say to him in my own way that every Member of the Senate owes him a debt of gratitude and appreciation for the many hours he has spent in behalf of them and in behalf of our country.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I fully concur in the compliment paid to the distinguished Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER]. I know the job of going through a detailed bill like this, with the many projects and many problems involved. It is probably the most difficult appropriation bill that comes before the Senate. I have appeared before the committee. I have endeavored on occasions to get money from him. I have not always been successful.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I have not always been successful either, but I still like the way he treats me.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes; even though I have not been successful he has always been thoroughgoing in his effort.

I would be remiss if I did not pay tribute to the very distinguished clerk of the committee, Kenneth Bousquet. He has been with the committee a long time. He knows the bill from one end to the other. He is really a great credit to himself and to the Appropriations Committee for the fine work that he has done year after year.

While I have an opportunity to do so, I should like to say that I have voted for the bill, even though I did so with reluctance, for the very good reason that while the President's budget provided for 42 new starts, I believe the House has added 5, and the Senate added 34 new starts. That commits us in the future to approximately $534 million.

I remember the difficulties we had when the bill went to the White House. I might have made a statement before its passage. I did not do so. But that is neither here nor there.

I can only say that the President and the Bureau of the Budget, in an endeavor to protect the budget, will probably look at this bill with a bit of a dismal eye. But that does not demean the fact that the distinguished Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER] has done a topflight job.

I note the presence of the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. DWORSHAK]. He is the ranking Republican member of the subcommittee. This is painstaking labor, believe me. It keeps one in the committee room day after day.

So I salute my colleagues for their fidelity. I salute them for their diligence and for their service in the public interest.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I am proud to associate myself with the statement made by the distinguished Senator from Illinois, particularly as it pertains to the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. DWORSHAK] and the distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. ALLOTT].

I trust that the result of the vote—86 to 0—notwithstanding the policy of this administration to have no new starts, and with the cooperation of the Senators named, will make it possible to place this measure on the statute books and get the new starts under way. I think the country is deserving of some new starts. I think the Senate, by its vote of 86 to 0 has indicated that it desires new starts.

I think the Senate should be complimented for handling in a nonpartisan way, and with complete fairness today a very important treaty and agreement involving the honor and responsibility of the United States. It was negotiated by the leader of our Nation.

Also, the Senate is to be complimented for passing one of the most important appropriation bills to come before it at this session.

If we can deal with "new starts" in the days to follow as we have dealt with them today, disposing of each as it comes up, with fairness, with diligence, and with responsibility, I have no doubt that the Senate will be able to complete action on the measures which the House has already passed, and that we can return to our respective States by Labor Day, and permit our constituents to pass judgment on our action.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, before the majority leader addresses himself to a new subject matter, will he yield to me?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. When the majority leader speaks of the vote of 86 to 0, I thought I had qualified my vote, in part. On one other occasion I think there was a vote of 85 to 1 in the Senate. I happened to the "1." One stands out a little like a lighthouse in the fog. It is like the old World War I song: "They were all out of step but my Jim."

Perhaps I was out of step, but I still believe I should qualify my vote and advert to the fact that there are new starts which have not been approved by the Bureau of the Budget and by the President, and they commit the Government to future expenditures of something in excess of $500 million. At a time like this, with so many fevers in the world, I believe we ought to be very solicitous about the solvency of this country, as we have never been before.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I believe I heard the majority leader say that we would apply ourselves to bills passed by the House. Am I to believe that we will take up no bills other than those already on the calendar?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. No; I would not want to foreclose action on any bill; but I should think we would take them in the order of priority; that it would be the better part of wisdom if we acted first on those which have already been passed by the House.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Then the Senator intends to include for further consideration bills which are not on the calendar at present, should they be placed on the calendar?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. That is correct. I would not foreclose action on any bill which has not yet been introduced or is to be introduced. That is a matter for the majority of the Senate to act on. I am only the agent of the Senate. Sometimes I am not a very good agent. I am trying now to dispose of matters—appropriation bills and other items—on which the House has acted. Then other measures can follow, if that is the disposition of the Senate.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, while a substantial number of Senators are present, will the distinguished majority leader advise us about the time for convening tomorrow?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. If the Senate is willing, I would suggest 9:30. I assure the Senator from Illinois that his presence would not be required before 11 o'clock.

Mr. DIRKSEN. My presence is always required, because I never know in advance, quite, what mischievousness might develop which might require my attention.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I was trying to assure the Senator that nothing mischievous would develop before 11 o'clock. There will be the prayer; and Senators will have an opportunity to make insertions in the RECORD during the morning hour. I would not permit, promote, or anticipate any rollcalls of any nature. If so, I would certainly see to it that the Senator from Illinois had advance notification.

I hope the Senate will convene at 9:30. Perhaps if we do, it will be possible to adjourn or recess early in the evening. Several Senators have expressed concern about missing dinner. If we convene at 9:30 and make really good progress on the bill tomorrow, I will suggest to the Senate that the session be concluded by 6:30 or 7 o'clock.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The only difficulty with that is that some of the most delightful mischief occurs in the morning hour, and I would like to be around if that happens.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I invite the presence of the Senator from Illinois at 9:30 in the morning.

FAIR LABOR STANDARDS AMENDMENTS OF 1960

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 1817, S. 3758.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (S. 3758) to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, to provide coverage for employees of large enterprises engaged in retail trade or service and of other employees engaged in activities affecting commerce, to increase the minimum wage under the act to $1.25 an hour and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Texas.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I submit an amendment which I ask to have printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received and printed, and will lie on the table.

ORDER FOR ADJOURNMENT UNTIL 10 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, out of deference to the Senator from Illinois, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its deliberations today, it adjourn until 10 o'clock tomorrow morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I am grateful for that.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, for the benefit of Senators and their wives who may have other engagements tomorrow evening, I will suggest that the Senate have no votes after 7 o'clock tomorrow evening.

I announce that the Senate will convene early and remain late for the remainder of the week. Since we shall convene at 10 o'clock tomorrow morning, and in light of the fact that we have had a long day today, Senators may understand that there will not be any yea-and-nay votes after 7 o'clock tomorrow evening.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, does the distinguished majority leader have any announcement to make with reference to how long the Senate will remain in session tonight?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I understand the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] desires to make a statement in explanation of the bill this evening. I do not know how long he will take. I do not think he will take very long. I should assume that the Senate could recess or adjourn by 8:30.

PUBLICATION OF NEW DAILY NEWSPAPER IN PORTLAND, OREG.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, it will come as encouraging news to many who are concerned about the trend to monopoly in the newspaper industry that a new, independent daily paper will begin to publish in Portland, Oreg., around November 1 of this year.

Born of the management-inspired strike against the two Portland dailies, the Portland Reporter has been staffed by strikers displaced from their jobs by imported strikebreakers. The Reporter has been publishing twice a week in a plant owned by the Portland Journal of Commerce. Now it has bought its own printing plant, thanks to the efforts of some 50 Oregon unions and labor councils who raised $100,000 for the purpose of establishing the Reporter as a daily.

It is good to know that the lopsided news coverage in the city of Portland, both of whose existing papers are heavily biased politically and economically, is about to have some competition from the men and women who are devoted to journalism for itself, not for the monetary profits which can be made from a newspaper. Portland has long needed some competitive newspaper reporting; I believe the Daily Reporter will offer it, and thereby reverse in one city at least the alarming trend toward newspaper monopoly.

Secondly, it is also good to know that out of the evil of professional strikebreaking as practiced by the Portland Oregonian and the Oregon Journal has emerged an enterprise which will be a monument to free unions. These newspaper men and women who will staff the Daily Reporter are longtime residents of Portland; they have long been part of its community life. In their ruthless labor policy, the two existing newspapers stooped to an infamous importation of strikebreakers from many parts of the country. They imported into the city of Portland people who are only temporary residents, many of them with unsavory reputations in other cities where they have worked as strike-breakers.

Many will wish the Reporter well simply because they want to see these displaced employees stay in Portland and continue practicing their high standards of journalism.

My own good wishes go to the Daily Reporter because I do not think strike-breaking of the kind engaged in by the Portland dailies should succeed in driving from the city these valuable citizens; it also has my good wishes because I know how important it is that the major city of our State of Oregon have fair and impartial presentation of the news.

I have mailed my subscription to the Daily Reporter. I look forward to receiving it when it begins publication around the first of November.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed at the conclusion of these remarks an article entitled "The Reporter Will Go Daily," published in the Oregon Labor Press of July 29, 1960.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE REPORTER WILL GO DAILY—PRESS AND BUILDING NOW BEING READIED

It's definite and final: the Portland Reporter will become a daily newspaper before the end of the year.

November 1 is the target date for daily publication of Portland's new, independent, liberal newspaper.

Long-brewing plans to launch the Reporter as a daily became definite this week when the newspaper leased a building of its own and a complete printing plant.

The Reporter, born last February and published twice a week by the members of Portland newspaper unions, already is well established and highly regarded by readers and advertisers.

The Daily Reporter will be an afternoon newspaper.

Publisher Robert D. Webb said The Reporter will carry national wire service news and syndicated features. It will continue to be published in its present tabloid page size.

"Our news emphasis will remain where it is today—on accurate, impartial and lively coverage of local news and features," he added.

Webb predicted at a press conference Tuesday that the Reporter will start daily publication with a paid circulation of at least 50,000.

Growth of the Reporter from last February's 8-page strike weekly to a full-fledged daily newspaper is a Cinderella story of American journalism and trade unionism.

One of the magic wands helping the Reporter's dream to come true is the Rose City Development Co.

The company was formed by more than 50 Oregons unions and labor councils to buy and remodel the building which will be leased to The Reporter.

Union investments ranging from $50 to $17,000 had reached a total of $100,700 on Wednesday of this week.

"When all commitments are fulfilled, it now appears that the total will reach $140,000," said A. T. Williams, Sr., president of Carpenters Local 226 and president of the development company.

With great personal dedication and sacrifice, Williams has worked night and day for 5 weeks to finance the purchase and remodeling of the Reporter's building.

OLD BUILDING REMODELED

The building is a 43-year-old red brick structure covering half a block on Northwest 17th Avenue between Northrup and Overton Streets.

It was purchased last Friday from the Railway Express Agency for $70,000 cash.

Although it was once used as a stable for horses and wagons of the historic Wells Fargo Express Co., the architect for the Reporter said the building is "exceptionally well suited to remodeling for modern newspaper production."

Remodeling will begin as soon as the city planning commission approves the plans and blueprints prepared by Architect John W. Reese.

Ample offstreet parking will be provided on lots adjoining the newspaper plant.

Meanwhile the Reporter's second magic wand already is waving. A complete printing plant is on its way to Portland from Miami, Fla.

The plant was used to print a daily newspaper in Florida until a few months ago. Webb said it is "a complete, modern newspaper plant, including everything from presses and linotypes to desks, chairs and paper clips."

Owned by the International Typographical Union, the plant is being leased to the Reporter. It includes a press capable of printing a newspaper of 96 tabloid-size pages.

The first shipment of 28,000 pounds of equipment will arrive here from Miami this week. Additional shipments are expected weekly throughout the summer, while the building is being remodeled to receive them.

Officers of the Rose City Development Co., the Typographical Union and the Reporter emphasized this week that the unions will not influence the policies of the Reporter in any way.

"The Reporter already has proved that it speaks with a completely independent voice, and we want it to remain that way," Williams declared.

The Reporter will apply to the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission for a permit to issue stock in the newspaper, Webb announced this week. The stock issue, when approved, will be offered to the public on a nationwide basis.

UNIONS INVEST IN BUILDING

Officers of Rose City Development Co., in addition to Williams, are James T. Marr of the Oregon AFL–CIO; Edward J. Whelan, Multnomah County Labor Council; Francis Murnane, Longshoremen, and George Salmon, Machinists 63.

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SESSION OF OREGON STATE GRANGE

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, at the 87th session of the Oregon State Grange which was held in Roseburg, Oreg., one of the highlights of the session was the annual address of the master of the Oregon State Grange, my very good friend Mr. Elmer McClure. I particularly enjoyed my most recent visit with him late in June, when I had the pleasure of his company at breakfast here in the Capitol.

It is with great pleasure, therefore, that I ask unanimous consent that the master's address before the State convention of the Oregon Grange be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ANNUAL ADDRESS, 87TH SESSION OREGON STATE GRANGE

1. INTRODUCTION

This is the 87th annual session of the Oregon State Grange. This is only the third time in our history that we have had the privilege of convening in this beautiful city in the heart of the Umpqua Valley. When we first met in Roseburg, the year was 1912 and Roseburg was a quiet, happy little city, the hub of the vast agricultural area surrounding the town. Prunes were perhaps the major crop, and getting the first ripe watermelon of the summer was a real contest.

C. E. Spence was master of the State grange that year and in his address to the delegates, he announced that the U.S. Supreme Court had upheld the initiative and referendum law, and that the constitutional convention, proposed by the enemies of direct legislation had been defeated by a vote of more than 2 to 1, 59,000 to 23,000. Spence predicted, and how prophetically, that attempts to nullify the initiative and referendum would continue.

The second time we met in Roseburg, 1934, Roseburg was not such a happy and contented place. It, like the rest of the State and Nation, was still rocking from the stock market crash of 1929 and 1930. Ray Gill was master, and one section of his address was devoted to the AAA and the NRA, which, he said, was not a perfect piece of legislation, a view with which the Supreme Court later agreed, as you will recall. He also warned that our economy was suffering because of high interest rates.

Brother Gill further reported that the State grange had led the fight which defeated the second sales tax attempt. He, too, reported attempts to restrict and hamper the use of the initiative and referendum.

I hope no one will think that because we will again, in 1960, in session in Roseburg, give consideration to these problems, that no progress has been made or that we are in a rut.

In 1960, as we assemble in Roseburg, we find that once again Roseburg has changed. Her agricultural industry, while still the very fiber of which she is woven, has been augmented by the development of the lumber industry in this area. She has a new hustle that presages an expanding economy for many years to come. All of Oregon, as well as the rest of the Nation, has every admiration and respect for the way Roseburg sustained the shock of the explosion last year that left so much destruction in its wake, and for its quick and determined recovery.

In such an atmosphere the delegates to this session will surely find the inspiration and determination to solve the complex problems attendant upon an organization like the Grange which stands as an essential vehicle to our form of government and our way of life. And, like Roseburg, we can and will, reach our decisions with dignity and confidence.

2. AGRICULTURE

American agriculture continues to be the major weak spot in the Nation's economy. Solutions to the problems of agriculture are offered in wholesale lots these days. As one of America's favorite comedians is so fond of saying, "Everybody wants to get into the act." It seems to be the concensus that the biggest single need agriculture has at this point in our history is better public relations. I concur with the majority opinion, yet I am aware that public relations, per se, will not solve one single problem the farmer has. It will not influence any of the elements with which he must contend at the production level. It won't change the weather or drain a swamp. It won't kill a weed nor milk a cow. Public relations alone, will not pay off the mortgage nor control the market. But it will get the farmer, now a small minority, whose voice is often drowned out by the much stronger voice of the off-farm interests, better understanding from the general public.

Good public relations will alert the off-farm public to the farmer's problems and will bring understanding of the programs he is seeking to establish to meet his needs.

To explore this idea further, one of the farm programs least understood by the general public is the cooperative organizations which are so vital to the small farmer. To start at the real heart of the problem, we find a vast majority of our population today almost totally ignorant of agriculture. Only a few years ago, most people in America had either grown up on farms or their parents had been raised on farms. They still had grandparents and other close relatives engaged in agriculture. They knew and appreciated the value of the family farm as the backbone of American community life and of the agricultural industry. They were interested and sincerely desired a prosperous agriculture for this country.

Now we have millions of people who have no more farm experience than a drive in the country will give them. They have never had occasion to evaluate the role of the family farm in the American scene. When these people read newspaper and magazine reports that cooperatives are devices to avoid taxation or that they are inimical to the free enterprise system, they believe it. These are the people who lend their support and their strength at the ballot box to legislation to tax cooperatives out of existence or to put so much hampering regulation on them that they will be ineffective. They also lend strength to the opposition when legislation is introduced into the Congress or into a State legislature to aid and strengthen the farm and rural cooperatives.

Now you and I know that only through strong cooperatives can the small farmer hope to compete with the giant industrialized agricultural enterprises that are threatening to completely dominate the agricultural industry. The majority of Americans, I am afraid, simply do not understand what it would mean to the political and economic life of America if we permit American agriculture to be completely industrialized.

It is the job of public relations to create and to expand in ever-widening circles this understanding.

This same lack of understanding on the part of the general public exists in almost every phase of the production of the food and fiber that supplies this Nation in such abundance. Somehow, the general public must be made to realize that the family farm is the heart of a strong and healthy agriculture in this country, without which America cannot continue to grow and prosper. The benefits to agriculture and indirectly to every person in this country from such programs as those designed to aid in soil conservation, tree farming, land bank, transportation, education, financing, and above all, research—research into the growing processing, packaging, promoting, distribution, selling, yes, and even into the consumption of farm products, must be understood by the general public. They must know why the farmer must have all of these programs if he is to remain in business. And have them he can if he does a good enough job of public relations. If he has proper public relations, the public will insist that such programs be put into practice because the public will then understand that to do so is a wise investment that will result in a higher standard of living for every person in this country.

It is my recommendation that the Oregon State Grange and every one of its Pomona and subordinate granges adopt an all-out program to improve agriculture's public relations. This is not a job that can be done once and forgotten. Public relations is a continuing struggle. People who listen to us today, and are convinced, listen to others tomorrow and are once more in doubt; so that we must have a continuous program of keeping people informed about agriculture.

3. SOIL CONSERVATION

Soil conservation programs in Oregon have met with general acceptance by the public as well as most farm people. While, of course, the general public knows little or nothing about the mechanics and techniques of soil conservation, there is widespread appreciation of the basic truth that nations survive and are great and prosperous only so long as they maintain and increase the productivity of their soil. There is little opposition to State and Federal programs of soil conservation among the off-farm public.

As for the farmer himself, he has the evidence of the success and value of soil conservation programs ever before him. He is convinced of their worth. Oregon has 57 individual soil conservation districts, all established by petition and vote of the landowners within these areas. There are now 40,743,146 Oregon acres in soil conservation districts. These districts are in 32 of Oregon's 36 counties. Twenty-one counties are completely covered by districts.

This program is steadily expanding. During the past biennium, three new districts were formed and seven existing districts were enlarged. Methods and practices are constantly studied and improved. This is a program that should have the unqualified endorsement and cooperation of the Grange.

4. FARM FORESTS

Income from farm forests is a major share of net farm income in Oregon. In 1958, the last year for which statistics were available, out of a total crop income in Oregon of $210,272,000, farm forests contributed $6,166,000. This was the 10th most valuable farm crop in that year. These figures, of course, do not include animals and animal products.

This income could and should be expanded manyfold. Oregon's climate is ideal for the growing of trees and much of her area is more suitable for the growing of trees than for any other use. Its optimum value can be realized only if it is devoted to its natural use. Perhaps the chief reason more farmers do not use more of their forest lands for the growing of trees is our present method of taxing forest lands and growing trees.

It is a grave error for Oregon to continue with a tax structure that discourages farm forestry. The day is not too distant when farm forests must supply a major portion of the saw timber for the lumber industry. Lumbering is Oregon's No. 1 industry. It is to the benefit of all of us to adopt a program that will allow the lumber industry to continue to expand.

During the last year, the State grange has had an interim committee working on the subject of timber taxation. Their report will be before you for consideration later on this week. It is my recommendation that the State grange adopt a policy supporting an ad valorem tax program that will encourage the growing of farm forests without penalizing other classes of property.

5. GRAZING LANDS

There continues to be considerable dissatisfaction among cattle and sheep ranchers whose operations depend upon grazing permits in the national forests over the administration of the grazing permits. Many ranchers complain that the rules and regulations set up by the Forest Service to govern their policies and individual decisions are not readily available nor are they clear and understandable. The result is that many ranchers have great difficulty planning their operations. The size of a herd of cattle or band of sheep cannot be changed much from day to day if a rancher is to continue in business. When he has planned his operation and the size of his herd around a permit to graze a certain number of cattle or sheep, having his permit suddenly reduced by half can cause him tremendous losses.

It is, of course, true that range and water conditions vary from year to year depending upon weather and other factors. But with good range management practices, the productivity of the grasslands and the amount of available water can be somewhat stabilized.

The livestock industry is one of the more important elements in the economy of this State and the State grange should use its strength and influence to the end that the national forest grazing lands in Oregon shall be developed to their maximum productivity and that their use shall be distributed equitably and reliably.

6. WILLAMETTE BASIN PROJECT

In the relatively short time since any part of the Willamette Basin project has been in operation, the total direct dollar benefit to the area amounts to $58,350,000 in prevented flood damage and in hydroelectric power revenues. In addition to this, benefits upon which it is impossible to place a direct dollar value include irrigation, navigation, domestic water, pollution abatement, recreation, and soil conservation.

Work is continuing on the project with local, State and Federal cooperation. Its eventual effect on the economic and social development of this State is impossible to determine. Already foreshadowed, however, are many changes. Each county in the area covered by the project reports changes directly due to the project. Multnomah County, at the mouth of the Willamette Basin, reports significant decrease in stream pollution due to the more constant flow of the river as a result of flood control storage in the upper basin. Several counties report a shift in agricultural crops from small grains, etc., to row crops and nursery stocks. Still other counties are most concerned with the increase in water freight with barge lines operating between Portland, Salem, and Albany. Several counties report greatly expanded recreation activity with fishing, boating, water sports, camping and picnicking becoming much more important in the lives of the residents of the area.

All of these uses are important and it would take more than a Solomon to determine which is most important. I do not think such a determination, if it could be made, has any value in adjudicating priority use. Because water used for irrigating farm crops has a direct dollar benefit does not mean that we should not use water to water lawns and shrubs for our homes and parks. We can figure out how many dollars we have saved by controlling floods, but how can we reduce to dollars the social benefits of healthy, outdoor recreation?

It is, therefore, with regret that I watch the increasing tension between groups of people eager to appropriate some project or other to the use of that group at the direct expense of all other users. The rights of farmers, even though farmers are decidedly a minority group, numerically, to equal use of the impounded water in the Willamette Basin projects must be maintained. It would be utter folly to permit the recreational use of water impounded in dams to supersede the agricultural and stream flow maintenance use of the water.

7. ROGUE BASIN

When we consider the undeniable value of the Willamette Basin project to the State of Oregon as well as to the Willamette Basin proper, we must conclude that this type of project, i.e., the comprehensive development of an entire river basin as one coherent project, is the logical and best way to go about such developments.

There is evidence that residents of the Rogue River Basin are fast coming to this point of view and I recommend that we support this type of river basin development in Oregon whenever there is local demand.

8. EDUCATION

What's wrong with Oregon's schools continues to be a fascinating subject to many people. A great deal of bitterness has been engendered in the subject and I am afraid that we have now reached the point where we are permitting this bitterness to becloud the issues.

The situation reminds me of the old legend about the queen who sent two of her officers out to survey the vegetation in her kingdom. One of the men was told to bring back a specimen of every weed in the kingdom and he returned crying that her majesty the queen was in a mighty bad way because she had a kingdom full of nothing but weeds. The other man was sent forth to bring back a specimen of every flower he found in the kingdom. He came back most jubilant and informed his queen that hers was the most beautiful kingdom in all the world—full of nothing but flowers.

I really believe that many people in Oregon are so busy hunting "What's wrong with education in Oregon" that they have completely lost sight of the fact that much is right with education in Oregon. The danger here is that unjustified attacks on educators or school administrators puts these people on the defensive and while they're in the mood, they defend everything in sight—right or wrong.

This is a dangerous attitude on both sides. It's dangerous because it tends to divert energy and attention from the real business at hand—getting the best possible education for every single child in our State—at a price we are willing to pay. We are a long, long way from that goal. Sometimes I think we have our signals crossed and that we aren't even headed in the right direction. But we certainly aren't getting any closer to it while we, figuratively, stand still watching the supporters of today's methods and the detractors of them flail each other over the head.

It is up to us to see to it that our criticism of Oregon's schools and educational system are truly constructive. When educators and school boards refuse, as some of them do, to give consideration to such criticism and refuse to make any effort to remedy bad situations, they should be held accountable. Probably the weakest spot in the educational system in Oregon is school boards. It cannot be denied that many school boards pay too little attention to criticism of the schools they administer. This is certainly not true of all school boards by any means. In the last few years school boards have formed their own association and are making every effort to improve the administration of the schools. They are making progress—and from all indications, they are on the right track. In those school districts where the school boards really run the schools with the desires of their communities in mind, we have outstanding educational programs at a cost the district can afford to pay. This is as it should be.

Because we live in a democracy, it is by law the responsibility of the school board to set the educational policy of the district and to see that it is carried out. It is up to you and me as voters to see to it that we elect school boards with the strength to carry out their duties. No school board has the right to transfer this responsibility to a hired administrator.

It is really too bad that most of the anger directed at the shortcomings of our schools is aimed at the teachers. I've even heard them blamed for the extravagant school buildings. Such criticism should be aimed at the school boards. There's where the authority and the responsibility really lie.

The State grange education committee has devoted a great deal of time and study to the school problems in Oregon. Theirs is a very well thought out and comprehensive report and I hope you will give it and their recommendations, which will be before you a little later in the session, very close and careful consideration.

9. POWER

The recent increase in electric power rates for the entire State of Oregon excepting only those areas in which there are competing public power facilities spread the gap between the cost of public and private power even further. In its wake, we notice a revival of interest in some areas in putting into operation dormant PUD's, as well as in expanding the boundaries of existing and operating PUD's.

This is a very healthy movement and I recommend that every subordinate and Pomona Grange in an area affected by one of these projects give it every consideration and where such projects are feasible that the grange lend them every support.

The grange has long had a firm policy of supporting development and expansion of publicly-owned distribution systems because there can be no doubt that public power means an abundance of low-cost power to all classes of consumers.

10. REGIONAL CORPORATION

The State grange is also on record in support of a regional corporation for the development of the Columbia Basin resources. I think we must reaffirm this position. Continuing the present practice of taking each dam, each generator, each transmission line before the Congress for authorization and appropriation is simply not doing the job that should be done if this Nation is to receive the benefit of full comprehensive development of the Columbia River Basin resource.

If we must continue battling for each dam, how many more key damsites are we going to lose as we lost Hells Canyon? How many times can the general unorganized public be brought together into such a movement to save a valuable damsite?

Presently the Washington Public Power Supply System is engaged in an all-out effort to secure a license to build Nez Perce Dam with non-Federal funds. Nez Perce is considered by most engineers to be a key damsite to further comprehensive development of the river basin. If a 700-foot-high dam is built on this site as recommended by the U.S. Corps of Engineers in its 1958 report, it would provide 6 million acre-feet of storage with an ultimate power-producing capacity of 2,400,000 kilowatts. Even so, it does not seem possible to get authorization for a Federal dam at the Nez Perce site at the present time. So in order to get the necessary development, the WPPSS has filed an application with the Federal Power Commission for a license to build the Nez Perce Dam. It may or may not receive the license. This continuing struggle over each new project keeps the entire situation in turmoil. A regional corporation, however, could build, either out of revenues or by issuing revenue bonds, the right dam in the right place at the right time. We could have maximum orderly development of the region's river resource. Anything less will certainly penalize the economic development of the Pacific Northwest for decades to come.

11. INTERTIE

At the last two sessions of the State grange, we have considered the question of an intertie between the Bonneville Power Administration lines and California power systems. We decided to support the intertie in principle, but we did not commit the State grange to any specific proposal.

Recent developments lead me to believe that the soundest policy for us to adopt at this time is that before we sign any contracts to furnish power to California users, we must have established a marketing area for Bonneville power. Any power sold outside of this area should be sold on an interruptible basis. At the present time, BPA has a surplus of power which could be sold in California to the great benefit of both regions. However, as the demand for power in the Northwest grows, the time is probably fairly close at hand when we will be needing all of the BPA output in our own area. It could be most detrimental to our own interests if we are firmly committed to provide power to California markets.

State grange policy should be that we support an intertie to furnish power to California only if it is firmly established that the Pacific Northwest has the prior right to BPA power.

12. TAXES

Resistance to tax increases continues to mount throughout the State. In the recent primary election in most counties, every measure to set a new tax base or to authorize the issuance of bonds was defeated. School districts throughout Oregon have not approved their budgets. Even the increase in legislators' salaries was defeated, though I am sure that most people are fully aware of the injustice of asking our legislators to serve their State at a financial loss.

On the whole, I think taxpayer resistance is a healthy thing if it is not carried too far. We could seriously hamper the operation of our State and foolishly curtail needed services. We could refuse to make investments in facilities needed to expand our economy that would result in tremendous economic losses. I am particularly reminded of the Dock Commission installations in the Portland Harbor.

The Dock Commission proposes to issue revenue bonds to expand and improve the cargo handling facilities in the Portland Harbor so that Portland will be second to no seaport on the Pacific coast in its cargo-handling ability. These facilities, if installed, would undoubtedly result in a tremendous increase in the economy of the whole State. Now if blind tax resistance leads the voters to reject this bond issue, as they have so many others, they will most certainly have done serious injury to their city and to themselves. Somehow voters must be taught to distinguish between wise investment of public funds in terms of the dollar and cents value of the services supplied and the extravagant expenditure of public funds and to vote accordingly on revenue measures.

13. SCHOOL TAXES

Schools continue to be the most expensive item in our State and local budgets. Ad valorem taxpayers are looking to the State for a measure of relief. Many taxpayers are asking for an increase in State basic school support. Some people are advocating that the State pay one-half the cost of schools. I am a little concerned over this proposal. If the State is committed to automatically furnishing one-half the operating cost of all schools, we could find our school programs being expanded on the thesis that any added expense would cost only 50 cents on the dollar.

While I think it might be good to increase basic school support payments, I would warn against the legislature adopting any policy statement committing the State to pay one-half of the operating costs of schools.

14. HOMESTEAD EXEMPTION

Pressure for a homestead exemption from payment of taxes continues to grow. Oddly enough, most people think this is a new idea. Far from it. In reading the proceedings for the session the State grange held in Roseburg in 1934, we find that that year, too, the State master was warning against such an exemption. The reason he gave then is the same reason I give today. Such an exemption would become too great a burden on other property taxpayers.

It is true, however, that mounting taxes are becoming unbearable to many retired people living on fixed incomes. I think we must adopt some program that will afford them a measure of relief. If taxes on their homes could be deferred for the balance of their lifetimes, the accrued taxes, without penalties or accrued interest, could then be collected from their estates. This would lift the burden from these older taxpayers without penalizing other classes of property taxpayers.

15. THE FORAND BILL

The percentage of people over 65 is higher in Oregon than in the Nation as a whole, so health problems and medical care for our older people is of greater concern in Oregon than in some other States.

Under present medical programs many, many of these older people who have managed to save what should be enough money to keep them in comfort and security during the closing years of their lives, have their entire savings wiped out by a single illness, leaving them in abject poverty dependent on State welfare for the balance of their lives.

Private hospital coverage plans do not protect these people from such financial disasters because private coverage plans reserve the right to cancel coverage and these older people, after years of paying premiums to such companies, all to often find themselves canceled when they most need insurance protection.

The last two sessions of the State grange have considered this problem and adopted a policy supporting legislation to broaden the social security program to provide medical coverage for those retired on social security. The Forand bill, now before the Congress, would provide this legislation. I, therefore, recommend that the State grange give every support to the passage of this bill.

16. INTEREST RATES

The skyrocketing cost of credit has reached the danger point. It has now come to the place where interest charges are threatening the entire economy of this country.

Interest is a cost that every one of us pays, whether we have any personal indebtedness or not. If you are one of the very few fortunate people in this country who is completely free of debt, don't think you aren't paying any interest. You are.

For instance, interest on the national debt, now the second largest item in the national budget, exceeded only by national security, amounts to more than $9 billion a year. The average income taxpayer in the $5,000 per year income bracket, pays $51 of this $9 billion.

Public utilities, which finance their operations almost wholly with bonded indebtedness, are now paying about 100 percent more for interest than they paid in 1947. In this same space of time, 1947 to 1959, the general Consumer Price Index rose about 25 percent. In other words, the cost of interest increased four times as fast as the average commodities included in the Consumer Price Index.

Commerce of all kinds in this country runs on credit. Any increase in the cost of credit increases the cost of doing business and the cost of the product for which each one of us, as a consumer, must pay.

The tight money, high interest policy has been especially damaging to the homebuilding industry upon which Oregon's lumber industry is so dependent. Mortgage money for home buyers is costing up to 7 percent in the West and 6 percent in the East.

If you are paying for consumer credit, you are probably paying anywhere from 9 to 30 percent interest on a 12-month contract.

Interest costs are, to a great extent, influenced by the rate of interest allowed by the Federal Government on Government bonds. The present attempt to push a bill through the Congress to remove the ceiling on interest rates on long-term Government bonds should be defeated and I propose that the State grange do everything in its power to bring about the defeat of any legislation that would tend to increase interest rates, either on public or private indebtedness.

17. LEGISLATION

The Grange has been a legislative force for good in Oregon as long as it has been in existence. Unlike most organizations, the grange does not confine its interests to those matters that would affect the economic status of one particular group. Such groups often promote their own interests even at the expense of the general public. Nor are we like many organizations formed solely to push some specific piece of legislation through the legislature. These loosely knit groups, with which we often work, have no permanence. They go out of existence when the legislation they are seeking is either passed or defeated.

The Grange is permanent. It has very broad interests and it dedicates its efforts to the good of the general public. Our members come from nearly all walks of life and every point of view is expressed and considered before State grange policy is finally set. Once we set a policy, it then becomes the duty of the State officers to seek every honorable means to put that policy into effect. Often, many years go by before conditions are such that a particular policy can be put into action. For instance, the Grange set its policy calling for direct election of U.S. Senators as long ago as 1885, but it was well into the 20th century before that policy went into effect. Our history is replete with such examples.

Often political alinements shift several times during the course of a long struggle to have some particular legislation adopted. Even support for it within the State grange and within the subordinate and Pomona granges varies from year to year. The State grange dictates no policy to any member or to any subordinate grange. Only the State grange officers are duty bound to carry out the policy set forth by the delegates in annual session. However, we cannot overlook the fact that it is essential to the success of any political effort that we have cooperation between the subordinate, Pomona and State grange. For this reason it is doubly important that delegates to State grange give very careful consideration to the policies they adopt for the State grange. It is also important that they consider the resolutions at State grange in terms of what their own subordinate or Pomona Grange might be willing to do by way of cooperating in any effort to carry out such policy.

Our legislative committee is in an embarrassing position when it goes before legislative committees or seeks support from individual legislators and is confronted with stacks of letters from Grange members, subordinate or Pomona granges, presenting an exactly opposite opinion than State grange policy.

Speaking of the legislature, there have been many changes in the operation of the Oregon State Legislature in the past few years. A few years ago, the general public was allowed to be on the floor of the house and senate chambers during sessions. They were more or less restricted to remaining outside the bar, but a great deal of leeway was allowed in enforcing this rule. Now the general public is not allowed on the floor and the doors of the house and senate chambers remain locked for the half hour before and after sessions. This takes the emphasis off personal contact with legislators and places it on appearances before legislative committees, letter writing, etc. Years ago, night sessions were held almost every night. During the last two sessions almost no night sessions were held. This means that the legislators disperse right after adjournment. Some of them commute long distances and are away from Salem when not actually in session or committee meetings. We can no longer depend on personal contacts to present our views.

Legislative sessions are much longer now, running upward of 100 days which keeps the legislative committee in Salem for a much longer period of time.

18. TRANSPORTATION

The importance of transportation to all Oregonians needs emphasis and reemphasis. All forms of transportation are important to our entire economy. Most of what we use is shipped into our State. Most of what we produce is shipped out. Freight and cargo rates have a direct bearing on how much business Oregon does and how lucrative that business is.

We must continue to encourage the development of all forms of transportation as competing entities. If one form of transportation is permitted to dominate and control all forms of transportation, competition will no longer be effective and freight rates will spiral upward. I, therefore, recommend that we continue our opposition to the present efforts of the railroad companies to broaden their franchises to permit them to enter into all forms of transportation. With their huge invested wealth, given to them out of the public domain during the era of railroad expansion into the West, they could soon dominate the entire transportation industry in this country. Killing off competition within a single type of transportation is harmful enough, but to kill off competition in the entire transportation industry would be folly indeed.

Water transportation on the Columbia and Willamette Rivers continues to expand, with oceangoing vessels expected to reach as far inland as Pasco, Wash., with the completion of the locks at John Day Dam. I recommend that the State grange continue every effort to hasten the development of water transportation in Oregon.

19. YOUTH CONSERVATION

The Youth Conservation Corps bill, which the State grange is on record as supporting, is now before the House, having passed the Senate. This bill is of extreme importance to Oregon as much of the development of picnic and camping sites that would take place if this bill becomes law would be in Oregon and the Pacific Northwest. This means that Oregon, in addition to the interest we share with the rest of the Nation in this program as a wise effort that is already proven to be effective in preventing juvenile delinquency and developing strong and healthy young men, also has this additional motive.

In recent years, many large companies, such as utilities and lumber companies that own or control large areas of land have adopted the practice of developing picnic and recreational sites for the use of the public. This is a most valuable public relations program for these companies and is of inestimable value to the general public in terms of recreation.

This kind of program is not too great a burden to power companies, with their assured income, but many lumber companies, even though desirous of developing such picnic and recreational sites in the public interest, find the burden too great. If this Youth Conservation Corps were established, many of these sites could be developed under this program.

20. CONCLUSION

In making those recommendations, I am aware that, because of the limits of time, I have had to omit many subjects that I would like to have mentioned. Many of these will come before you in resolutions from subordinate and Pomona granges and I know they will receive very careful consideration.

I am glad to report that we have many more resolutions than usual for the consideration of the delegates during this session. This bespeaks increasing interest in grange affairs throughout our State. It is most gratifying, even though it makes a heavier burden on the delegates. I have every confidence that this group of delegates is equal to the task and will, as have so many bodies of State grange delegates in the past, bring out of all these proposals a wise program that will be in the bests interests of the people of the State of Oregon.

I am sure that all of us will enjoy this session in Roseburg and that when we have finished our work here, we will be proud of it.

PROPOSED DEPARTMENT OF HOUSING AND METROPOLITAN AFFAIRS

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, the Farmers Union Herald of June 20 contained an editorial entitled "Federal Voice for Cities Is Urged." This thoughtful editorial comments upon the proposal advanced by the distinguished senior Senator from the State of Pennsylvania, Senator CLARK, when he introduced legislation to create a Department of Housing and Metropolitan Affairs with full cabinet status.

Mr. President, the problems of the metropolitan areas are ones which will be brought increasingly to our attention in the years ahead. During both this session of the Congress and the preceding one my attention has been focused upon just one such instance. I refer to the testimony brought before the Joint Committee on Washington Metropolitan Area Problems. The deliberations of our committee have resulted in legislation which has passed this body and its counterpart. The general problem, of which the Washington Metropolitan area is but one specific instance, however, remains for the most part unmet although, in my judgment, legislation which could result from the work of the very able Senator from New Jersey [Mr. WILLIAMS] constitutes a very important step forward in bringing us to grips with the difficulties we must face in the near future.

I wish to commend both of my colleagues and those others who worked with them for the effort they have expended in this increasingly vital aspect of our domestic concern.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the editorial to which I have alluded be printed at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEDERAL VOICE FOR CITIES IS URGED

Among the vast and portentous developments that have changed the face of the American continent in the last century none is more important than the phenomenal growth of the cities.

A hundred years ago this was primarily a country of farms and small towns, of rural acres and villages. Today 6 out of 10 Americans—over 100 million persons—live in metropolitan areas.

Every study being made, every survey and projection, shows a continuation and even acceleration of this trend. Suburbs sprawl far into the countryside. In many places the suburbs of one city melt into the suburbs of another urban area. Along the east coast almost the entire area between Boston and Washington is urbanized.

This great shift in population with its change in our manner of living has not come about without marked deterioration in the operation of Government and public services. Planning has lagged far behind growth.

As cities have spread across county and State lines, the structure of governmental units has often become obsolete. A welter of special authorities and commissions have been created to fill the gap, but these are usually inadequate stopgap devices.

Not only is the organizational structure of Government outdated in many places, but what is equally important, the taxing mechanism of most communities is completely inadequate to the task. The property tax—a relatively fair tax a hundred years ago but now one riddled with inequities—is still the basic source of revenue of most communities.

Many communities have about reached the limits of their tax resources. State and local debt has risen 309 percent since 1946. During this same period Federal debt increased by only 5 percent.

The obsolete boundaries, the antiquated governmental structures and dated tax systems of cities and communities have resulted in a terrible lag in every manner of public facility and service.

Urban blight, spreading slums, and inadequate housing are a part of every city scene. As far back as 1956 the Census Bureau reported that 13 million urban housing units were substandard, and the situation has continued to deteriorate since that time. Half of the 13 million units were not considered fit for rehabilitation. The Rockefeller Bros. Fund puts the need for urban renewal at $3 billion annually, seven times what is currently being spent.

The transportation crisis faced by almost every major city is also growing in severity. Mass transportation and commuter train services have been allowed to wither away. Meanwhile, expensive highway systems are being built which often do no more than contribute to traffic congestion.

Water shortages as well as sewage and pollution problems plague hundreds of cities. Urban schools are badly overcrowded—schools are run in two and even three shifts in many places. Hospitals and health facilities are so jampacked they cannot begin to meet the need.

One proposal that has been made to give the problems of cities greater hope of solution comes from Senator JOSEPH S. CLARK, Democrat of Pennsylvania, himself a former mayor of Philadelphia. CLARK has introduced legislation to create a Department of Housing and Metropolitan Affairs with full Cabinet status.

In a searching speech made recently at George Washington University, CLARK asked that the cities of America be given a voice in the councils of the Federal Government equal to their importance. CLARK said:

"We have a Department of Agriculture, with a budget of $6 billion. We have a Department of the Interior concerned with millions of acres of empty land. But we have no department of the Government concerned with the problems of the metropolitan areas where most of our people live and where the need for expansion of public services is so heavily concentrated."

CLARK also called for "new concepts of federalism in line with the realities of modern life" and the deliberate expansion of Federal aid.

CLARK wants the Federal Government to be given a larger role in the payment of Government services because its taxes are fairer than State and city taxes.

CLARK points out that: "The tax issue is at heart a class issue." Federal taxes fall more heavily on corporations and high income individuals while State and local taxes tend to put a far larger burden on low income families. Those who oppose Federal action usually do so knowing that Federal aid redistributes the wealth downward.

The Federal tax system is also fairer because it is equally applied everywhere and no one can run away from it. Corporations cannot dodge it by going to States or communities which offer a favorable "tax climate."

The vast growth of metropolitan areas has brought with it a need for some fundamental rethinking of the relationships between our cities, States, and the Federal Government. Proposals to modernize these relationships will have to be given more attention if the vitality of the Federal system is to be preserved.

HERMISTON, OREG., SOIL CONSERVATION SERVICE OFFICE

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, it is with great pleasure that I bring to the attention of the Senate the honor accorded the staff of the Hermiston, Oreg., Soil Conservation Service office. The office has been given a superior service award for its outstanding work record of assistance to the farm families of the area cooperating with the Soil Conservation Service program.

The June 5 issue of the Oregon Grange Bulletin carried a complete description of the fine work being done by these career service employees.

It is important, in my judgment, that achievements such as this be given widespread recognition in view of the criticisms leveled at those of us who believe that the classified service employees deserved a modest pay increase which the Congress has recently enacted over administration opposition.
